While dipping may be done at any season, it should, if possible, be avoided in cold weather for obvious reasons. The most favorable time for the spring dipping is a few days after shearing time. By this time the ticks will have largely transferred from the ewes to the lambs. At this time comparatively little material is needed. If the flock is badly infested it is important to repeat the operation in ten days in order to destroy the insects that have hatched during the interval. The flock should again be treated in the fall, so as to go into winter free from parasites.

The usual dipping vat is a tank of concrete or metal, about sixteen inches wide at the top and narrowing down to eight inches at the bottom by about four feet deep and eight to twelve feet long. The entrance end is perpendicular and the other sloping with a slight dip. By this arrangement the sheep are forced to drop into the liquid, after which they can walk out by the sloping end on to the draining board.

To be most effective the dip must be hot or at about the temperature that a man can endure with the bare arm. The water should be softened with enough concentrated lye or wood ashes to give it an oily feeling. Any one of the coal tar preparations on the market will be found reliable and effective. These should be used according to directions on the cans or stronger for ticks, which is about one part of dip to two parts of water. scab, however, the dip should be stronger, say 1-40, to be effective. Tobacco dips are also satisfactory especially for scabies.

Profit in Draft Horses. The breeding of draft horses has come to be a profitable adjunct to the diversified farming. At no time during the past fifteen or twenty years has the price been higher for good draft and heavy farm horses. While the automobile may to a certain extent have replaced the horse for city delivery, still the bulk of the farm work is done with horses, and prices for good stock are as high or higher than ever.

There is not the demand for the thin quality and light weight horses that there used to be, but good smooth draft and heavy farm horses are bringing good prices. There is little reason why the farmer should not continue to raise horses of this kind. Brood mares and stallions, too, for that matter, will produce stronger and better colts for having been kept steadily at work on the farm.

Of Gray's "Elegy" a contemporary reviewer wrote: "The 'excellence' of this little piece amply compensates for its lack of quantity." That and nothing more. Of "In Memoriam" a contemporary estimate was that its "sole plea for touching verses" were evidently inspired by "the tall hair of the widow of a unitary man."

FEEDING THE COLT AT WEANING TIME.

Working mares, especially if they are in foal again, ought to be relieved from the burden of feeding the colt as soon as it can be done without risk of injury, writes W. W. Hunter in the National Stockman. With the well grown colt this may be done at from three to four months without the loss of a pound of flesh.

As the colt has already learned to eat oats, hay and grass and to drink water with its mother as well as to stay in its stall while the mare is at work, there is not much to be done, except to cut off one feed of milk at a time, milking out the mare to prevent gorging when the colt gets in her. I would let them out together for two or three nights, then keep the mare up and let the colt out at night, allowing it to suck once or twice a day, then miss a day, and in a week the colt will be weaned and the mother dried off so gradually that neither scarcely knows it. In the meantime the colt should have fresh water, crushed oats, choice hay, fresh cut grass within reach and once a day a scalded bran wash, with a fresh egg or two and a little salt mixed in and sprinkled with sugar. The colt feels the loss of companionship as much as the loss of milk, and if there is but one on the farm some member of the family can add to its comfort and value, too, by visiting it frequently, patting it, giving it a lick of sugar, etc.

In America the price of good weighty draft horses never was better than at present. The supply is not equal to the demand. The outlook for breeders would seem to be most encouraging, and those who raise the big ones with quality, whatever the breed, can expect and will receive a good substantial return for their efforts. It is not for us to say which is the best. That is largely a matter of taste. If a popular vote were taken the Percheron would stand at the head.

Conditions are different when the brood mare is not worked, but it will pay to bring in mare and colt occasionally for two or three weeks before weaning and treat them as has been suggested. It is important to have the colt stable-wise if not halter broken before weaning. This is the most critical period in the life of the horse, for if he loses 50 or 100 pounds of flesh now he will in all probability never regain it—that is, he will always be that much or more below what he would have been if he had grown right along.

Good care from birth to maturity will add 100 to 200 pounds to the weight of a well bred grade mare or gelding and add $25 to $50 to its market value. The milk of the average mare is 90 per cent water, and of the remaining 10 per cent two-thirds is lactose or milk sugar. This is a much higher per cent of that element than is found in any other milk except human milk.

The horse being a muscular animal nature furnishes the elements needed to produce muscle and energy rather than fat, and as a result the growing colt takes more exercise than any other young animal, and this evidence of good nourishment will continue after weaning if it is properly fed. Grass grown on rich land is a balanced ration for all live stock in a natural condition, but as we are growing the colt to meet the demands which are not natural it will pay to give a little grain throughout his growth.

Alfalfa, clover and red clover hay are all richer in protein and carbohydrates, the elements needed for his growth, than most other kinds of forage, and oats, rye, barley, wheat bran and middlings than most other grain feeds.

Weaning the Lambs.
When weaning lambs several things must be borne in mind. Put the lambs in a nice, fresh green pasture, out of hearing of the ewes. Put a dry time ewe with the lambs so from her they will learn to come at call and be more easily handled. See that they find water, and keep it fresh before them. Salt them in troughs so when grating is started they will find it easily and learn to eat it by having some salt mixed with it. And keep an eye on the ewes' milks.

TEST THE DAIRY COWS.

Record of Production Shows the Value of the Individual.

It is worth a lot to all thinking dairy farmers to keep constantly before their eyes the good records that good herds of cows are making. Take a farmer who knows nothing of what the good herds are doing, and he is about the most helpless man on the job.

Here are a few bits of experience which we take from the Tribune Farmer:

One dairyman of wide reputation concluded to try keeping a record of the amount of milk given by each of six cows. To prove that keeping records was nonsense he made an advance estimate. When the year's record was completed it was found that in order of merit the cows stood thus: First, his fifth selection; second, a cow not on his list; third, his fourth; fourth, not on list; fifth, his sixth; and sixth, his second. His selections of first and third were away down toward the lower end of the list. This record proved that one-fourth of his cows were being kept at an actual loss. The improvement of every herd depends upon periodical culling out of unprofitable animals.

In this connection the Iowa Homestead says: Frequently farmers express dissatisfaction with cow testing associations, complaining that the expense is too great. Yet these complaints would not seem to be borne out by the experience of the West Salem (Wis.) association, as revealed by the records of the different herds. One farmer, when shown in "black and white" that his cows produced only 152 pounds of butter fat in a year, or less than the average of the state, got exceedingly busy and hauled some of his "star boarders" to the butcher. The next year the average of his herd jumped to 195 pounds of butter fat, or twenty-five pounds more than the average of the state. The third year his cows produced 235 pounds, or a rise of 113 pounds of butter fat in three years. The average of all the herds of the West Salem organization was 228 pounds of butter fat for the first year, but after three years of cow testing it was 269 pounds.

With pure bred Jersey bulls at the head of his herd for twenty-three years Mr. L. E. Axtell of Wisconsin has developed cows that have the qualities and characteristics of full bloods. His bulls are most without exception, his daughters in milk before being placed in his herd. Such a policy promotes the breeding of dairy cows out of the point of quality and goodness. One of his cows is nine years old and has produced a calf each year since she first calved. She has a record of forty pounds of milk, yielding 100 pounds of fat for one year, and made an exceptional thirty day record—viz., 324 pounds of butter fat.

Pasture For Pigs.

Pasture, because of its accessibility, cleanliness and bulk, is really indispensable to a well grown pig, and it should always be supplied. It is the cheapest sort of feed, and cheapness as well as efficiency of rations should in all cases be considered. To keep the pigs free from worms, to which they are subject, a condiment should at all times be supplied. Sulphur, salt and copra or fish, which supply lye, are all good combatives, and something of this sort should be kept where the pigs can get it daily.

Frequently the dairy cow is not to blame because she fails to come up to the recommendation which is given her in advance. Remember she must have a chance after the new owner gets her.

LUDWIG DZWICK FOUND AT LAST

Insane Elmira Polish Farmer Arrested at Gaylord.

Discovery of his Whereabouts Made one Week After he Committed Depredations.

Ludwig Dzwick, the Polish farmer of Elmira, who attempted to kill his wife and family, shot his live stock, burned his buildings and disappeared and for whom a diligent search has been made, the Petoskey bloodhound being used in the trail, was found at Gaylord and is now held in the Antrim county jail at Bellaire. He will be brought to trial there for his misdeemeanors.

Late Wednesday afternoon, while in the B. Peter Johnson saloon at Gaylord, Joe Cole who had seen and talked with Dzwick before he had heard of his depredations, was considerably surprised to see the man enter the place and buy a bottle of beer. As soon as Dzwick had left, Cole instructed Frank Browiak to follow him. Browiak tracked the man as far as the grist mill, where Deputy George Nichols reached them and took Dzwick into custody.

In response to queries at the county jail, Dzwick said in broken English: "Ja, I am the man! I burn up the buildings. Why? Oh, I no like to stay at home any more. If I can get no good from my farm neither can my wife. I see the buildings burn, then I run. I no want to look back, I never want to see them again. If I go back, I do even worse to her. They can hang me if they want to; one leg over there, the other there; one arm over there, the other here. I no care."

These last words were accompanied by various gesticulations and it was evident the man was in a reckless state of mind.

In response to Sheriff Durfee's remark that he would have to keep him in custody until a deputy from Alma came for him, Dzwick replied: "I go anywhere you like. I no care where you take me. I never want to go back home."

During his entire conversation Dzwick seemed to be in a rational state of mind. He evidently did not realize that he had done anything of a serious nature, although, while a warrant for assault and battery is all that is charged against him, he may have the crime of arson to answer for. It is evident that the man is subject to violent fits of temper and it is thought that it was while thus incited that he acted so strangely.

In Counties Operating Under Michigan Local Option Law.

Nothing in the law Preventing the Making of Cider in Dry Counties.

An article supposed to have been sent out by the Brewers' association has been going the rounds of the state papers and recently published in The Courier has called forth the following reply:

Owing to the misunderstanding concerning the manufacture and sale of sweet cider in dry counties, published lately, I am writing the case as stated by Claude H. Stevens, Attorney Anti-Saloon League of Michigan, in the American issue of October 20.

Last December the Michigan supreme court handed down a decision with respect to a provision in the local option law concerning the manufacture of cider. During the last local option campaign notwithstanding an opinion by the attorney general of the state of Michigan to the contrary, the Brewers' Publicity bureau attempted to secure the farmers and cider manufacturers into voting against local option on the ground that cider could not be manufactured in dry counties. The fallacy of their statement was exposed during the campaign by the opinion of the attorney general of this state which is quoted below:

The original local option law Act No. 297 Public Acts of 1899, prohibiting in no-license counties the

THIS WINTER'S LECTURE COURSE

Will Open December 10 With "The Hussars," a Singing Band.

EVERY NUMBER STRONG ONE

The Many Advantages of a Lecture Course to a Town or City.

Largest Contributor to the Cause of Popular Education—Provides High Standard of Entertainment.

As announced last week Charlevoix will have a lecture course again this year, the first number being "The Hussars" which comes December 10. The advantages of a lecture course are ably set forth in the article we quote below.

The lecture and chautauqua platform is today recognized by our great politicians and statesmen, both progressives and conservatives, as one of two great factors in the wave of insurgency and reform which has swept over this country in the last few years. The other factor is the newspaper and these two institutions have, to no small extent, been traveling hand in hand. The newspaper, however, can not take the place of the lecture, nor the lecture of the newspaper, and the town which has not heard the views of our great public men from their own lips, and in their various effective styles of oratory, has missed that close touch and keen interest in the affairs of the day of which the lecture town boasts.

And then in every community there are young people both in and out of high school, who simply await the word rightly spoken, the inspiration rightly imparted, to spur them on through hardships to a goal worth while. Not only their parents but the community owes these young people the advantages which come from listening to good talent. Thousands of people throughout America today owe their inspiration and present success and happiness in life to the messages which came to them from the lecture platform at just the right time—messages not only to the head but to the heart.

Again there is the great general cause of popular education to which the lecture and chautauqua are the largest contributors. Comparatively few of America's millions of inhabitants go to college. If they are to be educated they must receive through other means and other institutions what is rightly styled "popular education."

Of equal importance is the maintaining of a high standard of entertainment in a country where every one must in one way or another be entertained. The two great sources of popular entertainment today are the theatre and the lecture course. The theatre is a very mercenary institution, in fact is run wholly for money. Few lecture courses are run for profit and when there is a profit, it goes into the building up of public libraries, other forms of popular education, or to increase the size and quality of the entertainment course of the subsequent year.

Tickets are now on sale at the usual price, and it is to the advantage of all to purchase season tickets. Further information will be given later.

D. B. OVIATT DEAD

Was Well Known in This City and Entire Section of Country.

Rev. Daniel B. Oviatt, pastor of the Baptist denomination at Alden, died November 13. He was taken sick while on a journey to New York state to visit relatives. He was taken off of the train at Lansing and died two hours later at the hospital of apoplexy. Rev Oviatt was well known throughout this part of the state, having served two years as state representative. He was, at the time of his death, cashier of the Alden bank. He has also preached many times here at the Baptist church. Besides the widow, a son and daughter now living in Wyoming arrive him, also two sisters residing in New York state. One of these upon arriving at the train to meet her brother received the telegram announcing his death. The funeral was held Monday afternoon at Alden, conducted by Rev. B. Atchison of this city.

FOR BENEFIT OF FARMERS

United States Will Have Demonstrators in Agriculture in Michigan.

INSTRUCTOR FOR THIS DISTRICT

Will Have General Charge of the Work in This Section.

Scope of Work Will be Large. Will Co-Operate With Farmers in Introduction of New Crops and Improved Methods.

Last spring there was included in the general appropriation bill in congress an item to cover the cost of extension work in the agricultural department, which has for its purpose the instruction of the individual farmer in farm management, and to engage in field studies and demonstrations for his benefit. On the first indication that such a provision would probably pass, Congressman Dadda made application for an agriculturist for his district. The application has been acted upon, and the 11th district is one of the very first to receive the benefits of this measure. Charles F. Reed of Howell is the man who has been appointed to the place.

Eben Munford has just taken up his work in Lansing as state leader of the agriculturists in the various congressional districts of the state. The following letter from Hon. C. B. Smith, who has national charge of field studies and demonstrations, will give our farmers an idea of the benefits to be expected from the experiment.

Washington, D. C. Aug 13, '12. Hon. F. H. Dadda.

House of Representatives. Dear Sir: The agent of this department which we propose to locate in Northern Michigan will, first of all, study the agriculture of that section as it is now being carried on, the types of farming that are proving most profitable on the different soils, the crops that give the best results, and the stock that pays best under different conditions, in order that he may learn what combinations of crops, stock, etc., are best in a system of farming for the different soils of that locality. In addition, the agent will co-operate with farmers in the introduction of new forage crops, cereals and vegetables that seem to promise well for that section. Among these may be mentioned hairy vetch, which is used for building up the soils and which is a profitable seed crop and forage plant for the sandy soils of the region, alfalfa for the better hard wood lands and clay loam lands, and the various kinds of winter spelt as a possible substitute or supplement to the oat crop. He will encourage the organization of agricultural clubs, both for men and boys and girls, for the purpose of improving agricultural conditions.

So far as may be practicable he will encourage the employment in counties of an agent to devote his entire time to the work in a single county, the man being employed co-operatively by the farmers and this department, in conjunction with the State Agricultural College

PERMANENT ORGANIZATION OF COUNTY Y. M. C. A. EFFECTED

At Meeting Held at Boyne City Last Saturday—Officers are Chosen—A. L. Coulter of This City Elected President—Prospects for Successful Work in This County will Begin December 1st.

The members of the Y. M. C. A. county committee met at Boyne City Saturday to plan for future work. It was found upon investigation that enough money had been raised by pledges to warrant permanent organization and it is hoped to begin work by December 1.

A constitution, similar in form to that followed in the other counties, was adopted. The officers are chosen for the ensuing year are: A. L. Coulter, Charlevoix, president; Hon. W. J. Pearson, Boyne Falls, vice-president; Harry Porter, East Jordan, secretary; and S. C. Smith, Boyne City, treasurer. The executive committee will consist of the above officers and W. H. Shaw and W. H. White of Boyne City; Hon. A. Bottars and R. W. Kane of this city and W. P. Porter of East Jordan. It was voted to authorize this committee to engage a permanent secretary and begin work as soon as possible.

Secretary Van Dis of the Boyne department of the State Y. M. C. A. was present and fully explained how the work had been successfully carried out in other counties of the state, and the members of the committee feel sure the work will be a success in this county. Not only the boys living in the city but those in the country districts will be reached and given a chance to take advantage of the opportunities this organization offers them.

Coming home, the lunch in which the Charlevoix representatives and the foot ball team made the trip, broke down near Ironton and the foot ball boys made the hike home. The members of the committee however, went in for an auto and met it when about half way to this city.

Buffalo Oil Company has Representative Working in Hayes Township.

Test Well will Soon be Sunk. Operations will be Carefully Watched by Charlevoix County.

The oil fever has struck Charlevoix county. For several days, Mr. Norton, a representative of a Buffalo oil company, in company with Dean Scroggin, has been buying up oil leases in Hayes township. Leases have also been made out in Bay and Resort townships in Emmet county. A test well will be sunk in the near future, somewhere in the vicinity of Bay Shore.

There has long been a suspicion that oil might be found in Northern Michigan. Small pockets have been discovered at different times but never in paying quantities. Now, with the oil excitement all over the state, following the discovery of the real thing at Saginaw, it is the intention of the Buffalo company to find out whether or not oil does exist in this section.

The operations of the company will be watched with much interest.

DEATH OF AN OLD RESIDENT

John Connor Dies at Chattanooga While on Way to Florida.

Had Been a Resident of This City for the Past Thirty-two Years.

John Connor, one of the best known residents of this city, died in Chattanooga, Tennessee, Friday. Mr. Connor left this city about two weeks ago for Florida, for the benefit of his health. Upon his arrival at Chattanooga a week ago Saturday, Mr. Connor was taken sick and stopped in that city. Thursday he got out of bed, drew a portion of his money and sent it home. After that time he was confined to his bed.

Mr. Connor was born in County Limerick, Ireland, about 55 years ago and came to this country 60 years ago. He came to this city 32 years ago and has followed his trade of cobbling ever since. For several years he was engaged in the shoe business. He leaves a wife and two step daughters in this city. He had three children by a previous marriage. Mr. Connor was a veteran of the civil war, serving in the Confederate army.

The body was brought to this city Tuesday. The funeral was held from the home this afternoon. Rev. Quinlan Walker officiating. Burial at Brookside.

Notice Citizen's Mutual.

I have started suing 100 policy holders who have not paid their assessments. Shall sue others as fast as I can get to them. I will be at Charlevoix court house on Friday, November 20, 1912. J. L. Barber, receiver.—Adv.

TO ORGANIZE NEW SOCIETY

Horticulturists of Northern Michigan Will Have Society of Their Own.

Legislature Will be Asked to Divide Appropriation Between Both Societies.

Among the topics to be discussed at the winter meeting of the Grand Traverse county grange is that of a horticultural society for Northwest Michigan. It is found desirable to promote such an organization. It will be formed on lines which will put it on a par with the present society that has headquarters at Emmet. There is room in Michigan for two organizations, the same as there is a field for several normal schools. Whatever appropriations are made by the legislature for horticultural purposes will be divided evenly between the two societies.

Despite the fact that the largest settlements of new orchards in the state are in the counties in this part of the state, and despite the fact that this region is soon to be one of the most important fruit sections between the Atlantic and the Pacific, we get practically no recognition from the present society. Every officer, every member of the executive board, and the chairman of every standing committee is from the territory around Grand Rapids or to the south.

When the Traverse City board of trade invited the existing organization to hold one of its annual meetings in this city it was stated that Grand Rapids wanted the next session held there, and to Grand Rapids it went. The counties in this part of the state are entitled to help in their efforts to develop the fruit industry and perhaps the easiest way will be to form a region association with this end in view.

At the present time there are local horticultural societies for the counties of Antrim, Charlevoix, Manistee, and Benzie, also societies at Northport and Suttons Bay. These organizations can be affiliated with the region association as soon as the same is formed.

Birthday Party.

As we go to press this afternoon, about 20 of the old friends of Mrs. S. M. See are helping her celebrate her 75th birthday. Word comes that after a good dinner they are enjoying themselves talking over old times, and listening to music by Mrs. Williamson, Mrs. Hines and Mrs. Addie Holley. This is an annual event which we hope will take place for many years yet to come.

WHAT ARE COUNTY ROADS

Fully Explained by Chief Clerk Randle of State Department.

COUNTY ROAD COMMISSIONERS

Have Sole Jurisdiction and Control Over all County Roads.

Must Advertise for Bids—State Reward Paid for County the Same as for Township Roads. Amount runs $250 to $1000.

County roads are certain roads adopted as such by the board of county road commissioners and must lie wholly and entirely outside of the corporate limits of cities. Any street of an incorporated village may become a county road and participate in the county road fund, providing they are adopted by the board of county road commissioners, with the authority of such village, but such county roads cannot receive state reward on that part of any county road within the corporate limits of such village.

The proceedings necessary for the board of county road commissioners to acquire control of any street or public highway are that a year and may vote upon the adoption of any road or street shall be taken by the commissioners and notice of favorable determination shall be served upon the township in which such road lies, or upon the highway authorities of any village and published once a week for three successive weeks in a newspaper printed and circulated in the county. Proof of service and publication to be by affidavit. Sole jurisdiction and control over such roads is now vested in the board of county road commissioners and townships and villages are entirely relieved from their care and maintenance. Boards of county road commissioners at adjoining counties may unite in laying out and constructing a county road on a county line.

Proceedings for the discontinuance or abandonment of any county road, or any part thereof, are the same as for the adoption.

Where a proposed expenditure is greater than five hundred dollars for building, rebuilding or repairing of roads and bridges, the board of county road commissioners must advertise for bids, but have the right to reject any and all bids and do the work by day labor and purchase materials therefor, but must file plans, specifications, bids and reasons for not letting by contract, with the county clerk.

Counties participate in the state reward for roads the same as townships, as follows:

Class A, sand clay.....$20 per mile
Class B, gravel.....50 per mile
Class C, gravel-stone.....75 per mile
Class D, stone-gravel.....75 per mile Class E, macadam.....1,000 per mile
Class F, concrete.....1,000 per mile

Townships in counties under the county system may build roads the same as before the adoption of the county road plan and receive the state reward, but cannot bond and draw back their county road tax as formerly.

Counties under the county system do not necessarily have to build state reward roads but may improve county roads in any manner that seems best, but must counties prefer to build the state reward roads, as this reward is a considerable item of revenue.

The Proof That Charlevoix Readers Can Not Deny.

What could furnish stronger evidence of the efficiency of any remedy than the test of time. Thousands of people testify that Doan's Kidney Pills have brought lasting results.

Grateful endorsements should prove undoubtedly the merits of this remedy. Years ago people right in this locality testified to the relief they had derived from the use of Doan's Kidney Pills. They now confirm their testimonials. They say that time has completed the rest.

M. Bechtel, assistant supt. of Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 319 Madison Ave., Petoskey, Mich., says: "The public statement given by me in favor of Doan's Kidney Pills while living in Niles, still holds good. For nearly three years I was plagued with a constant ache across my kidneys. If I sat for awhile it was almost impossible for me to straighten. I was in bad shape when I began using Doan's Kidney Pills. One box completely relieved me, although other remedies failed. I had a recurrence of the trouble some time later, but I again took Doan's Kidney Pills, and they removed the attack."

Mrs. Emma Maier, 627 N. 6th St., Springfield, Illinois, says her kidney trouble resulted from an operation. "From then until I used Foley Kidney Pills I did not know what a wet day was. Then my backache left me, that tired, dragged down feeling was gone, I slept sound and awake refreshed. I had no more headache or dizzy spells." Safe and sure—Try them—Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

Claude Volkert and Harry Alex went to Ann Arbor last week to see the Cornell-Michigan foot ball game.

The report of out-side study of individual members of modern history class, makes the class an interesting one.

The foot ball team played Boyne City last Saturday and the C. H. S. foot ball boys expect to play Petoskey on November 23 on the latter's field.

The visitors of the H. S. last week were Hazel Baxter, James Gaskins, Harry Cohen, Emerson Hull, John Kirby, Hazel Maxwell, Mr. Briggs and Miss Deibel.

James Thero, Iron River, Michigan, says of Foley's Honey and Tar Compound: "This winter both my children and I were troubled with bad coughs. We used Foley's Honey and Tar Compound and it promptly cured us. I can recommend it as a good cough and cold cure." Contains no opiates. Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

COUNTY NORMAL.

Miss Beattie Hanshaw called at the Normal room Monday afternoon.

Misses Jessie Barkley and Dessie Groenink were appointed as house-keepers for last week; Misses Mahyn Cliffe and Blanche Rogers are to act as editors; and Misses Hazel Gilmarlin and Sophia Berg were appointed to attend to the ventilation of the room.

Monday afternoon the training room children, with the help of Miss Hines and the Normal class, gave a surprise party in honor of Miss Whiting's birthday. Margaret Milner presented Miss Whiting with a little gift from the children, a box of green stationery, and it was truly appreciated. Refreshments were served and every one seemed to enjoy the party.

Monday evening the class was invited to come to the Grange hall and listen to the program given after the regular business hour. Many interesting remarks as to what the Grange has done were made by the members in response to roll call and the lecturer provided a very entertaining program. Miss Hines was requested to give a report of the State Teachers' Association meeting, which she attended at Grand Rapids, and she reported many interesting things. The class was kindly asked to take some part in their next grange program.

"Charlevoix county school officers who attended the annual school officers' meeting at Charlevoix, October 22, found hot coffee and delicious doughnuts awaiting them as a result of the interest taken by Principal Jessie M. Hines and the members of the county normal training class in their welfare. The meeting was held in the county normal room and the result was most satisfactory. Considerable work was done in domestic science by the Normal students and it is of the most practical kind, the students using only such equipment as would be possible to have in a rural school. The students are shown not only what can be done in training boys and girls in the proper way to cook, but how warm noon-day lunches can be prepared and served in rural schools. The county normal has a school garden and phrases of practical life are introduced in the instruction of the students."—Moderator Topics.

HIS RISE TO POWER

By Henry Russell Miller,
Author of
"The Man Higher Up"
Copyright, 1911, by the Bobbs-Merrill Company

PROLOGUE.
Reader, here is a live, gripping, absorbing romance of politics—not the politics of a decade ago, but the politics of today. A young American of good fighting blood and hard, fixed ideas sets out to smash the political machine of his state without compromise with evil. The great moment of his life comes when he must sacrifice his clean hands or ruin the father of the girl he loves. The creative genius and large power of the author are even more notable than in "The Man Higher Up." Mr. Miller's preceding novel.

CHAPTER I.
Mists of the Morning.
It was twilight still in the valley, but over the hills to the east the sky was whitening. A young man sitting by his window turned to see the birth of another day. Throughout the night he had been staring at a vision. His vision he did not understand, save that for him it spelled opportunity—a chance to put into a drifting, rather ordinary existence, purposeful action to stretch his resources, rack his brain and tear his soul in the struggle that is the life of men.
He caught up a rough towel and, standing quickly out of the house, washed rapidly down the street. When the struggling towel lay behind him he looked into a slow trot. At a place where many feet had worn a path across a clover meadow he turned from the road. The path ended at a clump of bushes on the river bank.
Hastily unfastening, he plunged into the green depths, from which there had not quite taken the chill of spring. His little, strong body responded to the shock. The nerves, harried by the long night watch, relaxed. He shouted lustily. For a few minutes he swam vigorously. Then, reaching the shore, he took the towel and rubbed himself into a glow. He tingled with a sense of well being.
When he was dressed again, refreshed and eager for his day, he took the path back to the highway. The sun was climbing over the hills. He stopped and watched it while it swung clear in the sky, gleaming a fiery red through the mists of the valley. The glory of the morning was complete.
He was about to resume his tramp homeward when he beheld a strange procession advancing along the road, a young woman leading a limping horse. As she came nearer he chuckled aloud. The handsome pigskin saddle, the ivory-handled crop, the modish riding suit and hoots were not the equipment with which young ladies of New Chelsea were wont to ride.
She heard him and looked up coldly. The chuckle died instantly.
"Good morning," he said. "What's the matter with your horse? Can I help you?"
She stopped. "He has picked up a stone," she answered, "and I can't get it out. If you will be so good—"
He vaulted lightly over the fence that bounded the meadow and removed the offending stone.
"Thank you," the young woman said. "You're quite welcome," he answered. "I'm always glad to help beauty in distress. He is a beautiful animal, isn't he?" he added hastily.
"Are you calling me?" she asked coldly.
He repressed a smile. "By no means. Better not ride him for a little bit, until we see how he walks. You ride early," he ventured.
"No earlier than you swim," she replied briefly, glancing at his wet hair and towel. He at once became uncomfortably conscious of his rather unkempt appearance.
"Are you staying in New Chelsea?" "Yes."
"Shall you stay long?"
"Are you in the habit of cross examining strangers on the road?" she inquired frigidly.
He reddened. "I beg your pardon," he said and quickened his pace to let her draw ahead.
"I think I'll ride now," she said, "if you will help me up. Crusader has stopped hopping."
He held out his hand, she placed a foot in it and was lifted to the saddle. She murmured her thanks. But, although she gathered in the reins, she did not start away. For a moment she sat looking at the hills, apparently oblivious of the young man's presence. He wondered who she was and ventured again. "Why do you call him Crusader?"
She looked down at him. "Another question? You are impertinent."
"I beg your pardon," he said again stiffly and tugged up the road.

"I have named him that," she called after him, "because he has plenty of fire and spirit, but at critical times seems to lack common sense." She laughed, a free, musical laugh that somehow recalled the blood to his cheeks. He made no reply.
She watched him as he swung alone, frankly admiring the tall, cleanly built figure whose lines the loose coat hid. He did not conceal. She remembered the end of the big game eight years before, when a laughing, mud-stained young athlete tore himself away from his halcyon companions to buy his triumph at the feet of the day's sweet heart. She remembered also, with a smile, the shaming childish jealousy with which a freckle-faced, short-skirted girl had witnessed his devotion. "And you're still here, buried alive in this out-of-the-way corner of the world," she said softly. "Oh, John Dunmende! John Dunmende!"
Suddenly she touched her horse with the crop. He bounded forward and clattered along until the young man was overtaken. She pulled Crusader down to a walk, at which the young man looked up astonished. Churlish as to her identity, but fearing another reproach, he cautiously refrained from further speech.
They went along in silence until he reached a point where the undulating road rose to command a view of the valley to the south and the town to the north. She reined in her horse.
"What a pity one can't find words for such a morning! And the wonder of it is that it has returned, we don't know how many millions of times, at ways gleaming."
"It makes one feel a bit reverent," "It makes one feel as helpless as—"
She paused for lack of a comparison.
"As helpless as some chick will soon feel, unless the farmer's dog scares off that hawk," he completed the sentence for her, pointing. Over a barnyard in the valley the big bird was soaring in narrowing, lowering circles. From beneath came faintly the cries of frightened fowl. Suddenly the hawk swooped low to the earth. Scarcely pausing, it soared aloft once more, leaving panic in the barnyard and the chick the less.
The young woman laughed. "There's an illustration of one fundamental law."
"The supremacy of the strong? That's an old theory, I know. A very pretty one—from the point of view of the hawk. But how about the chick?"
"Oh, if one is born a chick—"
She concluded the sentence with a shrug.

Suddenly, With a Laugh, She Was Caught Amid a Clatter of Hoofs. of her shoulders. "Strength is its law. Hasn't the world always conquered and ruled by its strong?"
"I'm afraid that is true," he said soberly.
"Afraid! I should think you would be glad, since I have it from the Chelsea Globe you are a strong one." He looked his astonishment. "I know who I am!"
"Of course! Did you think I Dunmende?" she laughed. "Did I think your charms outweighed your convention? I am not a herbarian! I have the habit of philosophizing with strange young men on the road before 7 o'clock in the morning."
"What did you read in the Globe?"
"The vanity of men," I read. Mr. Dunmende will undoubtedly make a strong candidate. The entire county wants him. It will have him! It reads like a patent medicine advertisement, doesn't it? How does it feel to be wanted by an entire county, Mr. Dunmende?"
"It is," he confessed, "rather pleasant—if true. Who are you?"
And suddenly, with a laugh, she was gone, amid a clatter of hoofs.
Alone he addressed the morning. "She said I am strong. I wonder, am I strong—strong enough?" And, searching his soul for the answer, he heard no negative.
This chronicle, we neglected to state, begins at the beginning of the end of an epoch. The epoch has been variously styled a golden age, a period of prosperity, an era of expansion. It was all of that—to a few. For others, though they did not see it, it was a recession, a trace in the struggle, as life itself, between the many and the strong.
William Marchell was a distinguished member of a class whose climbing proclivities are not shadowed by the faintest of a lowly start. He was born in the obscure hill town of New Chelsea soon after Andrew Jackson and his contemporaries promulgated and illustrated the immortal doctrine, "To the victor belong the spoils." In the fashion made popular by Abraham Lincoln and other great men he secured an education and on the day he attained his majority was admitted to the practice of law in Benton county.
About the same time he entered the broader profession of politics, helms then a lukewarm Whig.
His military services are perhaps best dismissed with the mention of a certain gold medal struck in his honor by special act of congress, for gallant conduct on the field of battle. The vicious have made much of this decoration. However, it probably required a finer courage to resign from the color guard of his home guard regiment on the eve of Gettysburg—this indeed was the fact—to accept the less exposed office of aid to the governor at the capital than to face the hall of rebel bullets. There are many ways of expressing one's patriotism. Later he served his country as probitorary for Benton county. Afterward he passed through many gradations of political preferment, as representative in the general assembly of his state, as state senator, as state treasurer and finally as United States senator, which exalted office he held until—but we anticipate our history. He became in addition leader of his party organization and enthusiasm employed by those who objected to the term "boss."
William Marchell's creed was that of a respectable but practical man. He was a negotiator and a proselytizer, an elder and a believer in the time of reconciliation and in a liberal scriptural hell for those not numbered among the elect. He believed devoutly in the avowed and tacit principles of his party, although he was not bigoted and would on occasion take a soft hand in the affairs of the opposition. He had more than once been out of the party fold, but he had never who ventured to oppose his leadership.
He lived during at least two months of every year in the town of his birth, either in the square, white frame house on Maple street or at the farm three miles west, which he let "on shares." Now Chelsea was a quaint old fashioned town lying at the head of the Wehmanock valley, quite content with its population of 5,000 and with the honor of being the county seat, which Marchell's influence had prevented from being moved to Plumville, that thriving little factory city fifteen miles away.
Down Main street one fine June afternoon he was walking with that air of abstraction which sits so well on the great.
"He has big possibilities." Unconsciously the senator spoke aloud.
His companion seemed to understand the reference. "He's all right," he answered. "State Senator Jim Sheehan was a big, fat gentleman with furrowed, twinkling eyes, a meddler of coarse good looks and a rolling, cork sure gait bred of no misfortune. He was a son of power. Fifteen years before he had gone to Plumville to work in the mills, an unconquered, unlettered Irishman, who could tell a good story, hold unlimited quantities of liquor and was not unwilling to work when money could not be had otherwise.
But not long for him had been the grime and roar and muscle racking of the mills. Money could be had more easily. Plumville was booming. There were streets to be graded and paved, public buildings to be constructed. Jim went into politics and because he was a good "vote getter" and had a certain rough talent for the game acquired power. He opened a saloon and acquired more power. He became a contractor and secured many contracts. One day the city awoke to the fact that Jim Sheehan owned its government. The citizens cried out in protest—and, with the habit of American cities, little and big, submitted. He became, by virtue of his alliance with Marchell, state senator from Benton county and leader of the county organization.
"He's all right," he repeated and chuckled.
"He's all right," said Marchell. "Who's all right?"
"Why, Johnny Dunmende, of course! Didn't tell you how I happened to be going to see the state of the other way round, if I had not met you at the fair?" He threw back his head and the chuckle became a loud guffaw. "Sent word for him to come to my office on Tuesday at 2 o'clock sharp. Guess he knew what for. He came, all right!"

A Coincidence

By RUTH GRAHAM

Edwin Young was a man of very deep feeling. An engineer by profession, while engaged on the work of making a preliminary survey on a proposed railroad he was accustomed to stop overnight or for meals at farmhouses. During this time he might have stayed at a dozen houses in each of which he had seen from one to a dozen persons.

One day some time after the survey had been completed he received a note signed "Mary Warfield." It was written in the handwriting of a woman and confessed that he had stayed at the house in which she lived while the railroad was being surveyed and she had fallen in love with him. He probably would not wish to find her and if he did he could not do so, for she did not at the time she wrote him live at the same place. Her love was eating her life away. Nevertheless she would not be so unfeeling as to ask him to leave her. The only satisfaction she allowed herself was to inform him of her love.

Young was just the man to be impressed by a circumstance which came in ten men, though they might feel a bit flattered, would cast aside as a matter of no moment whatever. He had no desire to find the writer of the note, for he was a man of culture, while she was doubtless with little or no education. But he thought about this girl who was dying for him and wondered if she would be worth looking for. From thinking he came to looking. At times he was tempted to hunt her up, but in his calmer moments he saw plainly that such a course would likely lead to serious consequences.

Young, who had left the home of his parents, went to live in a boarding house in the city. It was near an important school building, and several women teachers boarded there. It is said that in the profession of teaching there are no prizes. Teachers don't go rich. They seldom make—at least as teachers—any mark in the world. Nevertheless their lives are on an interesting plane. With those in this house where Young boarded he became friendly. One of two of them showed him sufficient favor to warrant his looking over to them. The one he fancied was Miss Virginia Martin, seemed rather shy of him.

Perhaps it was because of this shyness and that Miss Martin was the prettiest of the lot that he liked her the best. "Where was her home?" he asked of that emotional nature which it was in him, though emotional does not correctly express it in her case.

She was, rather, one of those persons to whom the phrase "still waters run deep" applies. Young, after doing it in the evening, would be a great deal with the young ladies, and very soon they discovered which way the wind blew, would run over to their room, leaving him and Miss Martin together. That was such a change of fortune that it was an event in his life.

But before the coincidence Young told the girl about the letter he had received signed "Mary Warfield." He confessed that it had made a marked impression on him. Then he asked her if she thought it was by any higher law than it is a matter of each case bound to the point of view who had thought it out for her love for him. Miss Martin couldn't see that he was. He told her that he had made no effort to find Mary Warfield, and Miss Martin said that she had never heard of her. The matter didn't seem to be a great deal to him, but it was a great deal to her. He had in his mind some future that he might receive an answer from Mary Warfield, which would not only be a great deal to him, but would be a battle between him and the girl he loved, later to be his wife. Miss Martin said it was to be.

All went well between the lovers, though now and again Young would appear moody. Miss Martin on such occasions smilingly accused him of thinking of Mary Warfield. He would neither affirm nor deny the charge, but the girl present, the smile she gave him and perhaps a kiss banished the one who was dying for him.

When the summer vacation came on Miss Martin prepared to spend it at home, for she did not live in the city where she taught. Young was to take a couple of weeks in August for his own rest and was to spend it at his home, making the acquaintance of her family.

Miss Martin would have it that the matter between them was to be dropped from the time they parted till he had not her relatives. He was obliged to spend six weeks without a word from her. Then he joined her. He found her family country people of a different type. They were living in a town, away from them, where they had just bought a place. Young was still in the city, and the lady was equally so with his own people, whom she had to meet in the autumn, the engagement was to be considered as null. Then Young returned to the city.

The day after his arrival he received a letter from his fiancée. He shared the boy's feeling was that of Mary Warfield. The letter was full of love but made no mention of the matter that haunted Young. In a fever of uncertainty he rushed to the telegraph office and sent a dispatch.

"Are you Mary Warfield?"

"The reply came, 'Yes.'"

There was no mystery in the matter, she was a child in Mr. Young and Miss Martin's meanings.

ROAD TIPS FOR THE FARMERS

The farmers are realizing the advantages of having good roads in order to transport the products of their farms and enable them to dispose of them at reduced cost of transportation, and the remarkable progress being made in road improvement is not altogether due to the automobile.

When a farmer can hustle a load of produce to a railroad station in half an hour with one horse as against two hours with two horses he is saving money and receiving the benefits of good roads.

Good roads will change backward localities into progressive ones, enhance values and bring to general notice many resources which have only been known locally and not appreciated.—Better Roads.

Mr. Farmer

Every dollar sent outside of your territory for Flour, either wheat or buckwheat, means a dollar less to pay you for the goods you have to sell.

Dollars sent outside for flour are gone—never to return.

They are divided into profits between three outside classes.

The outside farmer.
The outside miller.
The outside railroad.

You get no money out of it. It does not help pay your taxes and buys you no goods. Now if we can not sell you as good a flour and as cheap we do not blame you. Buy where you can buy cheapest.

We know we can. We have every flour from the highest patent to straight winter.

Stone ground and roller ground buckwheat flours. Look after your own interests enough to ask our prices and try the goods before sending your money outside.

HIGHWAY OF THE FUTURE.

One Constructed of a Material Durable For Heavy Motor Traffic.

All road builders are now engaged in trying to devise a road which will stand motor traffic. Many new methods have been tried with varying degrees of success, but none of them seems to be perfectly satisfactory.

If broken stone is to form the wearing surface, then some means must be found to hold the binding particles so firmly that they cannot be sucked out, and sufficient strength must be given to the mass to enable it to withstand the sliding action of the wheels at bends and turns. Several kinds of tar macadam answer fairly well, but they are expensive.

It would seem that the most promising kind of road for heavy automobile traffic is what is called durax in England. It is a pavement of three inch irregular cubes of hard stone laid in small segments of circles.

These stones can be cut by machinery and are comparatively inexpensive. They are laid without grout, but there seems to be no reason for its omission except the cost. Great quantities of this kind of pavement have been laid in Germany.

CONCRETE BRIDGE WORK IN KANSAS.

State Highway Engineers Are Busy Preparing Plans.

Plans for thirty five concrete bridges are being drawn in the office of the state highway engineer in the Kansas Agricultural college. Twenty-four of these are to be built in Jewell county. Seven men are kept busy in the highway department now. Most of the work is with bridges. Three men are in the field all the time inspecting bridges under construction, and the other four make estimates and prepare plans. Two more inspectors are needed now.

When a call for help in bridge building comes in to the highway department an engineer is sent to look over the site and give a rough estimate of the cost. Whenever possible, concrete bridges are recommended. The engineer then comes back to the college and prepares plans and sends them, with an inspector, to the man in charge of construction. The inspector sees that the bridge is built according to the plans and specifications. He stays on the job until it is finished.

In choosing a site for a bridge an engineer sometimes is able to correct the bad location of the old bridge, and thereby make a better road and reclaim some good farming land. Such was the case recently when A. R. Losh, assistant state highway engineer, went to Butler county to look over a site. A new bridge was needed to replace an old one on which a good deal of money had been spent for repairs. Mr. Losh selected a new location for the bridge, which will do away with four dangerous curves in the road and give back two or three acres of farming land for cultivation. A concrete bridge that will be recommended and plans will be drawn for it.

The Skeleton In Old New York

By EDWARD TEN EYCK

During the early part of the nineteenth century one of the most fashionable residential parts of New York city faced the Battery. As the city grew the dwellings there became occupied for small shops, followed by skyscrapers. Recently the De Rooder dwelling was torn down in order to make room for a tower and roadway and revealed a vault which had been originally built to contain valuables. The door was paneled like the rest of the room and was only to be opened by touching a special button. This contrivance was so clever that it had doubtless not been available for many years. In the vault the workmen found a skeleton.

The find was reported to the historical society, and one of the members interested in old New York took it upon himself to learn if there was a record of any one missing in the family to which the razed house had belonged. The De Rooder had returned to Holland when the English took New Amsterdam, and the investigator wrote them, reporting the find and asking if any information could be furnished concerning it. The following is the reply he received:

"At the time the British General Howe occupied New York the mansion in question was occupied by an English family named Spencer. The De Rooder family still owned the property, renting it to the Spencers. After the Revolution a De Rooder came over from Holland to sell it and while in America heard of a mystery that had occurred in the house during General Howe's occupancy of the city.

"Alfred Spencer was a vigorous Tory. He believed that the untimely resistance to the king, as he called the Revolution, would soon collapse and the traitor Washington would swing to a gibbet. He entertained the officers of the British army of occupation, aiding and abetting them in every way in his power.

"During this time Abbe Spencer, his daughter, was furnishing information to the American forces under Aaron Burr, and I best believe the narrative of a Manhattan Island. An affair matter unknown to her father was that a Lieutenant Bickton in the army was her lover, and it was to him that she was transmitting information which on more than one evening she carried to him.

"A certain Woodbridge, I have heard, was in love with Miss Spencer and encouraged her to do so. In order to avoid suspicion as to her real sympathies she pretended to listen to Charles Woodbridge's suit, then a home-bred officer in the British army. Whether she loved him or not, she revealed the fact that she loved a kaiser. It does not appear. The point is that Spencer was such a thorough old enemy of the pure British type that if he had known of his daughter's compromising marriage with a detested rebel he would have taken her back to England at once. Abbe was understood to be an honorable girl, and it is not likely that she deceived Woodbridge as well as her father.

"When it was learned that the British forces were about to evacuate New York, Spencer determined to go with them, or rather to sail for England. As the Americans marched into town the white wives that were bearing Spencer and his family to England would be seen entering the Narrows of New York bay.

"There is no more extent in the English family sent by Abbe Spencer, how is not known to her lover telling him of the expected execution and that her father was about to take her to England. But she was intending to disappear just before the ship sailed, and he would find her waiting for him when he arrived.

"A packet sailed for England on the day the British left the city, carrying a number of Tory families who objected to remaining to be under the rule of the Continental congress. Indeed, if they remained it was probable that their property would be confiscated. Abbe Spencer made no objection to going, thus throwing her father off his guard. She contrived to elude him on his way to the ship with the other members of the family, she to go with friends in a separate boat. He got aboard the ship, and she was standing under before he was aware that Abbe was missing. When he discovered the fact it was too late to return, for the Americans were marching into the city. Rather than put himself in their power he decided to go on his way without his daughter, for he knew she had relatives in New York who would take care of her if she could take the next ship. That is, if she would.

"Abbe Spencer was not heard of after the evacuation. When he later arrived he was asked if he ever saw her, but never found her. Her fate was explained in the skeleton found in the home where she had died. She had hidden the treasure vault and had been unable to open the door after the family had left. Was it her? Did she her lover never know her terrible fate? He lived a life of a prey to uncertainty with regard to her, carrying a dress always marked with a spot of blood which was the result of a passion of a few years ago. It was a sad story, and it was a sad story that was told in the vault of those who were dead.

thought it'd do him good to come in here awhile—keep him from getting too cheery. Guess he waited about half an hour and then got up. "Present my compliments to Senator Sheehan," he says to the boy, "and tell him to go to the devil and learn how to keep his appointments," and left. "Lionel, about 3 o'clock I strolled out and got his message," Sheehan paused long enough to slip his thigh resoundingly. "He's all right. Ain't any one told me to go to the devil for some time. He'll be worth 500 extra majority to the whole ticket."

"If he'll take the nomination?" "Take it? Of course he'll take it. Ain't there $1,500 a year in it for him? And maybe when his term's ended he might go to the legislature as representative."

"Or state senator?" Sheehan grinned. "Say, do I look like I was on my way to the home yard?" He became serious. "What's the matter with the people, anyhow? Raise 'em! Calm all over the state—just because," he added complacently, "one trust company went up and the cashier shot itself. Ain't business good; ain't the organization given them good government?" he demanded.

"It has," Senator Murchell spoke with conviction. "What do they want, then?"

"I don't know. They don't know. And as long as they don't know," Murchell said dryly, "you and I, Jim, needn't be afraid." They had reached and turned the corner of the street that bounds the courthouse square on the north. They stopped at a corner, two room shack by the door of which hung a battered tin sign. "John Dummeade, Attorney at Law," Sheehan led the way inside. Through the door of the inner room came the muffled drone of voices. The two men seated themselves in the anteroom and waited. Ten minutes passed. Then the door opened and John Dummeade emerged, ushering out a big, bearded farmer. When the client had left the young lawyer turned to his callers and shook hands, warmly with Murchell and hastily with Sheehan.

"Will you step inside, gentlemen?" They took seats around the old time stained mahogany table.

"Well?" Dummeade's look addressed the remark to Senator Murchell. The senator smiled slightly. "I'm here only as an honorary vice president. Ask Sheehan. He likes to talk." "Sure," Sheehan grinned. "I ain't one of them that believes the fellow that don't talk is deep and wise. He generally ain't talkin' because he can't think of nothing to say." He paused and continued, "Well, Mr. District Attorney?"

"Isn't that a little premature?" John interrupted. For answer the Honorable Jim drew forth from another pocket a folded newspaper, which he spread out on his knees. Suddenly he began to read. "We should not dignify the present rather unsettled political conditions with the name crisis. But it is an unquestionable fact when our people must insist on their rights carefully, such a time it behooves it to be so. It is a time when men whose tenness and honesty are not open to question. Benton county has this fall to fill the important office of district attorney. Of all those mentioned for this post we know of none who so well fills the bill as John Dummeade, the popular and brilliant young lawyer of New Chelsea. His name—Sheehan's voice rose to a triumphant climax—"his name has brought forth enthusiasm wherever mentioned. The entire county wants him. It will have him." He looked up. "What do you think of that, eh?"

"Which of you," John asked, "in spirit that editorial?" "I did," answered Sheehan. "I didn't write it, though," he confessed. "Don't you think," John demanded a little sharply, "you might have asked my consent before using my name as a candidate? No, I understand you've come here to give me your consent to run?"

"We came to say we'd support you." "Then let me state the case to you as it is. The state is pretty much worked up over that trust company affair back east. I'm not sure it oughtn't to be worked up, either. The farmers in this county and a good many people in Platteville aren't very friendly to your personally at best. In short," he laughed, "you need some new timber to patch up the old ship of state. And you think I'll do it?"

Sheehan turned to Senator Murchell. "Senator, let's me and you go right out and resign and let Johnny here run things. Don't you want the job?" he demanded of John.

"I don't know yet. I'm thinking it over. But if I take it it will be on condition."

"On condition?" "That there are no conditions. I'd want to run my campaign and the office according to my own notions. I'll run it straight."

"Sure!" agreed Sheehan. "I really mean it, you know," John insisted. "I might even have to get after you, Sheehan."

This to Sheehan was humorous matter. "That's all right," he agreed again, grinning. "If you can catch me. You think it over, Johnny, and let me know tomorrow."

He rose. "Well, I guess I must be going. Are you coming along, senator?" "Not just now, Sheehan," Senator Murchell answered.

"I'll be sayin' good day, then," Sheehan shook hands with Senator Murchell and John and left.

Yield of Majority of Farm Products in Northern Part of the State.

Secretary of State Martindale Issues Crop Report for Month of October.

Wheat.
The condition of wheat as compared with an average per cent is 90 in the state, 91 in the southern and northern counties, 83 in the central counties and 89 in the Upper Peninsula. Computing the yield per acre by counties has made a slight difference in the total yield for the state as reported in the October crop report.

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in October at 94 flouring mills is 131,221 and at 91 elevators and to grain dealers 119,710, or a total of 250,931 bushels. Of this amount 152,538 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 65,839 in the central counties and 32,551 in the northern counties and Upper Peninsula. The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the three months August-October is 1,750,000. Eighty-two mills, elevators and grain dealers reported wheat marketed in October.

The estimated average yield of corn in bushels is 31.93 in the state, 33.29 in the southern counties, 25.71 in the central counties, 21.07 in the northern counties and 24.17 in the Upper Peninsula.

Clover Seed.
The per cent of acreage of clover seed harvested as compared with the previous year is 86 in the state, 87 in the southern counties, 78 in the central counties, 93 in the northern counties and 97 in the Upper Peninsula. The average yield per acre in bushels is 1.38 in the state, 1.12 in the southern counties, 1.48 in the central counties, 2.34 in the northern counties and 3.25 in the Upper Peninsula.

Beans.
The final estimated average yield per acre in bushels is 12.91 in the state, 13.05 in the southern counties, 12.71 in the central counties, 13.28 in the northern counties and 15.95 in the Upper Peninsula.

Potatoes.
The estimated average yield per acre, in bushels is 9.06 in the state, 10.05 in the southern counties, 7.81 in the central counties, 8.36 in the northern counties and 10.17 in the Upper Peninsula.

Commercial Fertilizers.
The per cent of farmers who have used commercial fertilizer on their wheat this fall is 24 in the state, 31 in the southern counties, 25 in the central counties, 4 in the northern counties and 3 in the Upper Peninsula.

Live Stock.
The average condition in the state of horses and sheep is 95, cattle 97 and swine 95.

Table showing for the state the number of bushels yield per acre of the following farm products for the year 1912:

Wheat	10.11
Corn	31.93
Oats	33.29
Barley	23.09
Rye	13.04
Buckwheat	16.12
Potatoes	9.06
Beans	12.91
Peas	15.81
Clover seed	1.38
Apples	41
Peaches	10
Pears	30
Plums	34
Cherries	34
Strawberries	50
Raspberries	25

*Sugar beets, average, 3,198; hay and forage, average, 2,333,019.

*The U. S. census gives 78,774 as the acreage of sugar beets in Michigan for the year 1903, the crop correspondents estimate for 1909 was 83,200 acres; both of these reports were considered too low by the beet sugar factory men who estimated the acreage at about 100,000 and about the same difference prevails this year.

ANCIENT FARMING WISDOM.

Cato proclaimed the fundamentals of good agriculture in his "De Re Rustica" when he said:

"What is the first principle of good agriculture? To plow well. What is the second? To plow again. And the third is to manure."

To the farmer who kept stock he said:

"Plan to have a big compost heap and take the best care of manure. When it is hauled out see that it is well rotted and spread."

And to the farmer who had no stock he said:

"You can make manure out of litter, hay straw, chaff, bean stalks, husks and the leaves of the flex and oak."

Useful Garden Tool.

My grandfather was a blacksmith and fashioned a tool which has been of great service to us in weeding and transplanting small plants, says a correspondent of Farm and Fireside. It is simply a miniature hoe made entirely of steel with a blade three inches long and one and one-half inches wide, and the handle is a small trowel one and one-half inches wide at place of greatest width and tapering to a point.

It can be used to loosen soil around small plants set a few inches apart, to dig weeds, for transplanting small plants and for clearing larger plants of bugs and worms. It is a necessary part of a greenhouse or hotbed outfit.

Royal Baking Powder Absolutely Pure

The Woman Makes the Home

She makes it best who, looking after the culinary department, turns her back resolutely upon unhealthful, or even suspicious, food accessories. She is economical; she knows that true economy does not consist in the use of inferior meat, flour, or baking powder. She is an earnest advocate of home made, home baked food, and has proved the truth of the statements of the experts that the best cooking in the world today is done with Royal Baking Powder.

THEATRICAL

The perils that beset the inexperienced and unprotected on an initial visit to a great city is strongly in evidence in William Anthony McGuire's play with a punch, "The Divorce Question," direction of Gamill & MacVitty.

The numerous pitfalls and snares to which the unsuspecting are subjected is graphically shown and he or she who can resist those powerful influences for evil must indeed have supreme will power.

Had the parents of children in point bestowed on them the proper care which was justly the children's inheritance, instead of consulting their own selfish whims, "I would have been far different, but as Kipling says "That's another story."

This sterling attraction plays at the Charlevoix theatre on Friday, November 22 with a cast of notable players.

DAIRY WISDOM.

Among the men who have been phenomenally successful on the farm those who have followed dairying stand out prominently.

Protein that is grown upon the farm is often more valuable than that which is purchased in concentrated form, and it is also cheaper.

The most expensive animal on the farm is the scrub bull.

The sum of money that is lost every year on the farms of this country by the dairy cows that are not bred especially for dairy work is stupendous.

The first essential in the manufacture of a high grade of butter is a good quality of cream.

Dairy stock on the farm is the keynote to sane and successful systems.

Rusty milk attends have no solutely no place in the dairy.

ENSILAGE FOR BEEF.

Results of a Feeding Experiment at South Dakota Station.

The South Dakota station has just finished an interesting experiment in steer feeding, the purpose of which was to compare the feeding value of an ensilage ration when fed alone with ensilage and hay, ensilage and molasses and with corn fodder, says Iowa Homestead. As a result of a ninety day feeding period an average daily gain of 2.4 pounds per head was made from the use of ensilage alone. In other words, this gain was made without the use of hay or grain other than the grain contained with the ensilage itself.

It required in this case twenty-six pounds of ensilage to make one pound of gain, the steers consuming an average of sixty-three pounds of ensilage each day. The ensilage was made from corn that was drilled and cut when most of the ears were in the dent stage. No bad results whatever were obtained during the entire feeding period, although, as said before, the steers consumed upward of sixty pounds each day.

In the case of another lot of steers with hay was used in conjunction with ensilage, the object of this being to determine the advantage, if any, that could be derived from feeding dry roughage along with succulent feed made from the corn plant. During the ninety day period these steers made an average daily gain of 1.25 pounds, each pound of gain requiring in this case an average of twenty-five pounds of corn.

At the twelve international shows this fall held the Aberdeen Angus cow lots of fat steers have won the grand championship prizes in nine of these shows, while all the other beef breeds have only won three grand championship prizes in twelve years. In the class of individual fat steers the Aberdeen Angus steer last fall took grand championship over all. The Angus bull shown was a prize winner last year.

slage for 7.7 pounds of hay. The steers consumed on an average 31.5 pounds of ensilage and 12.7 pounds of hay per day.

In another experiment at the same station continued for a similar period, shocked fodder was used. In this case it had stood in the shock for a period of ten weeks after which it was run through the cutter and blown into the silo, water being added to cause it to pack enough to exclude the air. On this ration the steers made an average daily gain of 1.94 pounds and consumed forty-five pounds per head daily.

Another lot of steers was fed for a period of ninety days on molasses alone and made during that time an average daily gain of 63 pound. It required in this case 132 pounds of molasses to make one pound of gain.

Where corn fodder from the shock was the sole ration a gain of 1.76 pounds daily was made for a ninety day period, the steers consuming an average of twenty-eight pounds per head daily.

It will possibly surprise many feeders to be told that during a ninety day feeding period on ensilage alone than from the feeding of a combination of ensilage and hay. The reason has prevailed in many quarters that animals would get out of condition, being particularly apt to scour if fed ensilage alone, but it would seem from this experiment that when a crop has been allowed to mature sufficiently, it is entirely practicable to feed upward of sixty pounds of ensilage daily to a steer. In these experiments the steers weighed between 750 and 800 pounds, so that after all they were not heavy cattle to begin with.

SEVEN GOOD REASONS GIVEN

In Favor of Counties Working Under Michigan County Road System.

BY CHIEF CLERK F. G. RANDLE

Tax is More Equitably Distributed Over the Entire County.

Makes Economical Purchase of Machinery Possible—Is Satisfactory, for no County Has Ever Abandoned the System.

In Michigan, the so-called "County Road System" is merely a plan by which the leading or main traveled highways of a county are placed in charge of a commission and improved by means of a tax levied on all city and village property, as well as the farm property, real and personal, pays its pro rata share of the tax and this contributes in an equitable manner towards an improvement which benefits every member of the community. That such a tax is just for and will be paid by the residents of cities is clearly shown by their large personal donations for good roads and the large urban municipalities given in favor of the county plan whenever this question is brought before the electors of a county. No intelligent citizen longer questions the fact that cities and villages prosper in a direct ratio to the facilities offered for getting into and out of them with all kinds of vehicles and all kinds of loads in all kinds of weather and at all seasons of the year.

It occurs to the writer that there are seven good reasons for working under the county road system, any one of which is weighty enough to warrant its adoption.

(1) It is an equitable plan spreading over all the taxable property in the county.

(2) It tends to make continuous main roads with no breaks at the township lines. This desirable feature is never attained under the township plan, while town line roads invariably suffer.

(3) Money enough is secured to improve deficient pieces of road that could never be touched under the town supervision. Many striking examples of this might be noted in such counties as Kalamazoo, Manistee and Wexford.

(4) Under the county plan, there are always two experienced men on the board. This tends to retain skilled employees in their positions, and it is true that county roads, as a rule, are distinguishable by their superior workmanlike features.

(5) The county plan tends to economy in the matter of road building equipment. One county in Michigan, not working under the county system, has six steam rollers and five rock crushers, all owned by townships. Under the county supervision, this machinery could do several times as much work as it now performs, to say nothing about the saving in the first cost and upkeep.

(6) It is satisfactory—for no county, that ever adopted the county plan and built roads under it, has abandoned it, although any county could do so upon a petition presented to the board of supervisors and the question again submitted to the people.

(7) It actually gets the roads. Saginaw county has built more than 100 miles of road under this system in the past nine years. No county in the state can show so much road built by townships in so short a time. This county has funds enough available to build 40 miles of macadam road in 1912. During the first five years after the State Highway Department was organized, 20 counties, working under the county system, earned 53 per cent of all the money paid out as state rewards.

The writer is firmly convinced that the county system supplemented by state reward offers to the rural communities the most economical solution of Michigan's road problem.

MOVEMENT STARTED

For the Establishment of County Agricultural Schools in Western Michigan.

A movement has been started in Grand Traverse section of Western Michigan aimed toward the establishment of a county agricultural school. The Grand Traverse board of supervisors, at its recent meeting, appointed a committee which, after going into the subject, decided that the proper time to bring the matter up for final consideration was next year. In the meantime, information regarding the workings of these county schools of agriculture will be obtained and put before the taxpayers. It is believed that the people of the counties surrounding Grand Traverse would be glad to have such an institution located in this part of the state that their sons and daughters desiring an agricultural education, need not go far from home. At the present time there is but one county agricultural school in Michigan and that is located at Menominee. It is expected, however, that within the coming five years, there will be at least five such schools in the Western Michigan territory, these being located at such points as to be convenient for the largest number of probable students.

FIRST NUMBER THE HUSSARS

Will Open This Winter's Lecture Course on the Evening of December 10th.

A New and Striking Feature Which is Making a Big Hit Everywhere.

As announced last week the lecture course this year is, if possible, better than ever. The first number will take place December 10, The Hussars being the attraction.

The unique organization known as the Hussars meet two demands of the present day, namely, military splendor and action and the folklicking spirit and dash of the college glee club. It has been organized and the program produced under the personal direction of the Redpath's special company organizer, Mr. Ralph Dunbar.

The Hussars are also referred to as a "Singing Band" and a "Brass Choir." They are beautifully costumed, and besides numerous up-to-date songs with choruses and action, present an original sketch called "The Hussars" in which several intensely amusing situations occur together with an exhibition drill, showing a number of beautiful maneuvers characteristic of this famous type of German soldiers.

The Redpath bureau's idea, however, has always been that a lecture entertainment should do something more than entertain and that it should leave behind something more than a recollection of gold braid, horns, flags and a number of rollicking songs given, and for this reason has engaged musicians for this company that are capable of singing anything from the most popular glee written for the men's voices to the grand opera choruses, such as "Soldiers' Chorus" from Faust, or the "Pilgrim Chorus" from Tannhauser.

Six members of this company also form a brass sextet, and the remaining three drum corps. The program is continuous, a series of military pictures and situations, woven together by dialogue actions, trumpet, drum and song.

It is something decidedly new and striking in lecture concerts, and has been making a big hit.

Benton is Elected.

At the meeting of the council Monday night L. E. Benton was elected alderman to fill the vacancy caused by the removal from the city of Alderman Geiken.

Mr. Benton has long been active in the affairs of the city and will make a valuable member of the city's governing body.

Farm Residence Burned.

The farm residence of John Webster of route No. 4 was destroyed by fire Thursday forenoon, caused by a defective chimney. The house is a total loss and only a portion of the contents were saved. Partially insured.

OPPORTUNITIES ARE GROSSLY EXAGGERATED

Is the Opinion of Ray Ashdon in Regard to the Far Famed Golden West—Many Michigan People There—Majority Would be Glad to Return to Their Native State—Interesting Letter.

The following letter received by L. E. Benton from Ray Ashdon who is at Hilliard, Washington, will prove of much interest to Conrier readers as well as his many friends here. Mr. Ashdon left Charlevoix October 7, and arrived at his destination four days later. The city of Hilliard is but a short distance from Spokane, practically one of its suburban settlements. He speaks of the scenery enroute as being especially fine, but the country itself is not what he expected to find. In this respect Mr. Ashdon regards the wonderful opportunities of the far famed golden west as grossly exaggerated. He finds that there are a number of Michigan people in that vicinity, a majority of whom would be glad to return to their native state if their means were such as to allow them to do so. Following we reproduce a portion of letter:

"I went to work the next Wednesday after I got here, and I have lost but one day, so you see I have a nice little stake coming now. I operated an electric crane one-half a day last week. There are about 900 men at work in the shops. I have worked on three different types of locomotives, one of them—what they call a 'Mallet' compound. These have two high and two low pressure cylinders and a 10x12 fire box. Big, well I guess—they scare me. Honestly, they are twice as long as anything I have ever seen."

"These are the mountain freight haulers. They haul from 45 to 50 loads or cars (this means about 2250 tons) over the hills. They have a new type coming that are ten feet longer than these. I will tell you what I try to believe is correct about this section of the country. About three-fourths of the people are wanting to go back to their former homes. There are about one-twentieth of the houses not occupied. They raise a nice grade of potatoes, large size, but not as good in quality as Michigan stock. I think they can raise more to the acre than they can in Michigan, of this crop. They sell for 40 to 50 cents for a sack of 100 pounds, this season. Eggs are now 40 cents for fresh, 35 cents for case. They certainly raise all kinds of poultry here. Some very good chickens, 16 cents a pound dressed, wholesale."

"The country raises fine crops, but land values are too high and everyone agrees to this. It has rained almost steady, but of course this is the off season. It snowed, just a little one morning, but since has been quite warm."

"I was at Fort Wright last week. They have quite a few colored soldiers there. We can go from here to town on the street cars, 5 miles for 5 cents; from there to Fort Wright, three miles, five cents. "There are lots of pretty spots here, the river has all kinds of drop so that there are lots of rapids. The New Monroe bridge is very nice. This bridge has the largest concrete span in the world."

Mr. Ashdon states that the climate agrees with him and his wife, he having gained a number of pounds in weight since his arrival. Speaking of the political situation, he states that there is considerable interest in that vicinity, but as yet is not greatly hindering the plans for future development.

FORTY-THREE YEARS

Mrs. Ellen Howe of Hayes Township Had Resided in This County.

Mrs. Ellen Howe, one of the oldest pioneers of this county, died at the home of her son Philip, in Hayes township Monday, of old age.

Ellen McMahon was born in Quebec 87 years ago and came to this county, with her husband, Chas. Howe Sr., 43 years ago. She leaves besides her husband, six sons, Chas. Howe Jr., Charles, George, Philip, Henry and Robert Howe, all of whom reside in Hayes township except Robert who lives in the west. The funeral was held from her late home this afternoon. Rev. Mr. Belknap officiating.

UP TO THE GOVERNOR

Efforts Are Being Made to Have Governor Intercede in the Swift Case.

According to the state papers an effort is being made to have Governor Osborn intercede in behalf of Herman L. Swift of Boyne City whose conviction was affirmed by the supreme court, it being alleged, that Swift is the victim of a conspiracy.

Governor Osborn cannot act until session is passed. Several men of prominence, including W. H. Hill of Detroit, who was the Bull Moose candidate for congressman at large appeared before the governor in Swift's behalf.

Extension Work.

Arrangements are being made for the taking up of the Agricultural extension work of the United States department of agriculture as outlined in The Conrier of last week. D. S. Payton has the work in charge in this county which means it is in good hands.

We will make further announcement of the plan and scope of the work as soon as the arrangements are perfected.

Surprise Party.

G. E. Dutton was given a surprise party Monday night, by about 20 of his friends, in honor of his 20th birthday. The evening was very pleasantly spent—it couldn't be otherwise at the Dutton home. On leaving a fine Mackinac boat was left behind as a reminder of the event.

Colonel Sanford of United States Engineers Here Last Week Inspecting Harbor.

Colonel Sanford, United States engineer in charge of the harbors in this district, was in the city the latter part of the week, accompanied by W. H. White of Boyne City and W. P. Porter of East Jordan, on an inspection of our harbor. The Colonel agreed that a twenty-foot channel, as asked for was necessary, so as to allow large vessels to enter, but stated that if deepened it would become necessary to also widen the channel. This would necessitate the building of a new bridge and other changes which would make a lot of work in this city.

In this connection it is rumored that the steel trust is about to take over the iron plants at Boyne City and East Jordan.

HILTON-WASHBURN

Charlevoix Girl Will be Married to Missouri Gentleman This Evening.

Announcements are out for the marriage of Miss Margery Egan, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Washburn of this city, and James Edward Hilton of Kansas City, which will take place this evening at the home of the bride's parents.

Mr. Hilton is the son of Mr. and Mrs. A. Hilton of St. Louis, and occupies the position of general motor inspector of the Frisco lines.

Among the guests from out of the city are the groom's parents and Miss Emily Hilton and Miss Alvina Charlton of Oak Park, Chicago, and Mrs. George Hoffman of Kansas City, who made the trip in Mr. Hilton's private car. Mr. Hilton, Sr. is the U. P. A. of the Frisco lines.

The Conrier extends congratulations.

The Divorce Question, which was presented in the Charlevoix theater Friday night, was fully up to the advance notices, being one of the best plays ever presented in this city. Every member of the company was well fitted for their parts and the play from beginning to end held the attention of the fair sized audience.

MANY SPECIAL PRIZES

Will be Given by the Poultry Association—Show Will be Held Next Week.

Next week is the date of the third annual exhibition of the Charlevoix Poultry association. The complete premium list which will be found on pages four and five of this issue is worth careful study, not only on account of the many liberal premiums offered, but the advertisements of Charlevoix business men are worthy your attention.

This year, in addition to the cash prizes and ribbons given as prizes, the association will give a silver cup valued at $25.00, as a special prize. This cup must be won three times before becoming the property of the exhibitor.

The Charlevoix poultry show has always been one of the best in Northern Michigan and its officers should receive the active co-operation of everybody in their efforts to foster interest in this important industry. If you have any poultry, make an exhibit, if not, plan to attend the show.

PROBLEM OF THE CRIMINAL

Very Interesting and Instructive Talk on This Important Question.

Given by Judge Mayne at the Meeting of Men's Bible Class Last Sunday.

The meeting of the Men's Bible class Sunday, while not as largely attended as hoped for, was very interesting. Judge Mayne gave a very interesting talk on the problem of the criminal.

The judge gave figures showing the large per cent of men, who are given prison sentences for minor offenses, become continued criminals. As a remedy for this the judge advocated the probation method. In connection with this he stated that he had placed 130 on probation and, of this number, only two had committed crime afterward and only about a dozen had broken their terms of parole.

It was also shown that while the reformation of the normal man, who might commit a crime, was possible by this method, the problem of the criminal could only be solved by the passage of laws restricting the marriage of the criminal classes. The problem of what to do with short timers was touched upon, the judge giving as his opinion that while it would be wise to have our long term prisoners build roads, in his opinion it was not best for the short term prisoners.

Taken altogether it was a very interesting meeting and furnished much food for thought. Music was furnished by the Congregational choir. Next Sunday the meeting will be in charge of court stenographer Henderson.

PROBABLY DEFEATED

Latest Returns Indicate Defeat of Equal Suffrage by a Very Small Majority.

According to the latest reports equal suffrage is undoubtedly defeated in Michigan. The latest estimates indicate that it has a majority of 55 against it with four precincts in St. Clair county to hear from.

Recounts will be asked for in several counties by the suffrage advocates, a petition already having been filed in Saginaw county. The opponents of suffrage will oppose a recount claiming it is unconstitutional.

If the official canvass shows that the amendment is defeated it will probably be again submitted to the people at the spring election.

Death of Ed Hentz.

Ed Hentz, a single man age forty, died at the home of his sister, Mrs. John Schaller of this city, Monday, of paralysis of the left side and swelling of the brain, after an illness of about four weeks.

He leaves four sisters, Mrs. Schaller, Mrs. Lou Alford and Mrs. Fred Coon of this city and one living in Lansing. The funeral will be held tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

HIS RISE TO POWER

By HENRY RUSSELL MILLER,
Author of
"The Man Higher Up"

was Hinch, the soldier and later the judge of the house of Dunneade.

Miss Roberta and John were sitting under a tree in the front yard. It was Sabbath afternoon in New Chelsea.

"I wonder," mused Miss Roberta, "how Steve Hampton liked the sermon?"

"He probably wasn't listening." "Warren Blake walked home from church with Katherine," she remarked significantly.

"She was there, then?"

"Didn't you see her?"

"I heard the air when she came in; but, strange to relate, I was more interested in the service, and I forgot to look her up after church."

"Why won't you go to see her?"

John rose with a sigh of resignation. "Aunt Roberta, you are a woman of one idea. I see I shall have no peace of mind until I've paid my respects to this glided lady. I go."

He could never repress a smile when he saw the Hampton place. Almost within the span of his memory its evolution—it was always called a "place"—keeping pace with its owner's fortune, had been wrought. The first house on that site had been a five room frame cottage, built just before the war when Stephen Hampton was manager of the Dunneade mills. It is said that he laid the foundation of his fortune in a certain contract for army horsehoes. In the seventies, being then owner of Plimville's largest iron foundry, he inaugurated the custom of returning to New Chelsea for the holidays. The little cottage was torn down. In its place was reared a red brick house, liberally marked with turrets and scroll work in the style of that period.

The family grew—even outgrew its owner, whose taste, if not his talents, ran to speculation rather than to production. He sold out and went to the Steel city to engage fortune via the bourse and the real estate market. In these days New Chelsea saw him and his family only seldom and only on the house with the primers had attained the dignity of a "country place."

New Chelsea heard that Steve Hampton had been admitted into the exclusive and exclusive circle of millionaires. With wealth and travel came taste. The "country house" was remodelled. The turrets were razed, wings were added to the house; the iron picket fence was removed and a hedge planted in its stead. Not all the architect's devices could make of the house a thing of beauty, so Ivy was planted and trained to enshroud its naked ugliness. A few years with its bare, assisted by the English gardeners, and the transformation was complete.

Rubber Roofing

"The roof that outlasts all other roofs on the roof"

Certain-teed Roofing has two big advantages—two good substantial reasons why you, too, should use it in the future. First of all it costs less than other styles of roofing and best of all it is easy to lay, weatherproof, windproof, rainproof and guaranteed to wear 15 years.

The sale of Ready Roofing is jumping up by leaps and bounds—the sale has actually doubled every year for the last five years—and this season more Ready-to-lay Roofing will be sold than ever before.

Here is the secret—the real reason why Certain-teed Rubber Roofing is crowding out all other styles of roof coverings—farmers, dairy-men, poultrymen and stock breeders find it costs less, lasts longer and can be laid for less money.

We have it in stock ready for instant delivery—Certain-teed Rubber Roofing, the big money saver. There is only one way you can find out just how much we can save you—and that is to call at your earliest convenience, get our lowest prices and examine this wonderfully durable guaranteed roofing for yourself. See us at once.

feeding, watering and bedding of the stock; but the association will not be responsible for accidents or losses.

Diseased Specimens

5. Poultry showing symptoms of disease, will be excluded from the show and returned to the owner.

Coups to be Furnished by Exhibitors

6. A large coop will be for rent at 25 cents each.

Entry Fees

7. The entrance fee for each single bird is fifteen cents, plus five (5) cents. This includes birds, ducks and geese. Members in good standing can enter birds, for sale only, free as the show department for providing suitable coops or paying rental for same.

Entries Must be in Name

8. All entries must be made in the name of the owner, and any attempt to evade this rule, such as borrowing birds, etc., will exclude the bird of the offending party from competition.

Exhibits by Firms

9. When two or more birds are shown as a firm, such firm must have been in existence at least three months prior to the show.

Judges Assistants

10. Disinterested parties will be selected by the executive committee to assist the judges in their duties.

Discourtesy or Interfering with Judge

11. Any person in any way interfering with the judge or discourtesy to the judging men will be declared from the privileges of the exhibition.

Premiums and Ribbons

12. Each class will have First, Second and Third Premiums on Cuck, Cuckoo, Hen and Pullet and Exhibition Pairs, and pairs in separate classes. The premiums shall be designated by a silk ribbon appropriately printed. First premium, blue ribbon; second premium, red ribbon; third premium white ribbon; and special premium, yellow ribbon.

Protests Against Rewards

13. All protests against rewards, etc., must be made in writing and delivered to the secretary before the close of the show, and must be accompanied by a deposit of $5.00. If after the matter has been thoroughly investigated, the charges should not be sustained, the deposit will be forfeited to the association.

Handling or Removing Specimens

14. No specimen entered for premium shall be removed from the hall until the close of the exhibition, and no person shall handle or remove from the coops the birds of any exhibitor without the permission of exhibitor.

Birds Without Leg Bands

15. All birds arriving without bands will be banded at the expense of the exhibitor. The charge will be five cents for each specimen.

Specimens From a Distance

16. All specimens coming from a distance will be given the advantage of a little rest and feed before weighing.

Remittances of Entry Fees

17. All entry fees must be made by P. O. order, registered letter, express or bank draft, and should be made payable to J. A. Auld, Secretary, 101 N. 2nd St. CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

Shipping Marks on Coops

18. All exhibits must be plainly addressed to the Secretary, and transportation charges must be paid in full.

Fraud or Deception and Undesirable Entries

19. The association reserves the right to withhold the premiums awarded in every case in which it shall appear that fraud or deception have been practiced or attempted. The right is also reserved to reject any entries not desirable.

Advertising on Coops

20. Advertising with exhibitor's name will be allowed on coops after awards are made.

Admission to Secretary's Room

21. The Secretary, Judges, Clerks and Members of the Executive Committee only will be admitted to the Secretary's room until after the awards have been placed. This rule is imperative and will be enforced without regard to persons.

Admission to Exhibition

22. Admission to the hall each day will be ten cents. Children under twelve years five (5) cents.

Exhibitors' Tickets

23. All exhibitors whose entry fees amount to $5.00 will be furnished with a season ticket, issued according to his instructions, but not transferable.

Sulphur.

Sulphur is a solid, nonmetallic mineral which has been known from earliest ages. It is hard, yellow and brittle and has a most offensive odor. It is found in veins or beds, mostly near active volcanoes. The imported sulphur generally comes from Solfatara, in Sicily, but large quantities are also procured from copper and iron pyrites. These minerals are heated, and the sulphur, being volatile, flies off in fumes, which are conveyed by means of pipes to a condensing room. If left in the powdery state in which it condenses it is called flour of sulphur. If melted and cast into bars it is called roll sulphur.

WELL KNOWN EDITOR

W. R. Goodwin of Breeders' Gazette Speaks Enthusiastically of Live Stock Show.

Mr. W. R. Goodwin, managing editor of the Breeders' Gazette, Chicago, in speaking of the International Live Stock Exposition, which will this year be held from November 30 to December 7, said:

"I have seen more of the great stock shows and fairs in America in the past 30 years than any other man, and I ought to be somewhat case-hardened; but the 'International' annually fills me with awe. I approach each exhibition of the consummate triumph of the breeder's art with a fairly reverent mind. A man may become indifferent to the roar of Niagara, but I do not see how any man can fail to find new instruction and inspiration in each of these shows. If I were, wholly a stock farmer, as I am partly, I would sacrifice much rather than miss an annual trip to the 'International.' The professional breeder may about as well take down his sign as omit this show from his year's program, and the stock farmer can gather almost as much of value from a study of its lessons. We must have meat to eat. The jaw of the civilized world rises and falls by the mastication of meat. The farmer of America—chiefly the farmer of the corn belt—must make this meat. He can learn more about its production at this great exposition than at any farmer's institute or special stock train that ever offered information. The stock farmer who works his brain as well as his body can make no more profitable investment than a study of the exhibits of the 'International'—the cattle, horses, sheep and swine. The farmer of no other nation have such opportunities. There is only one 'International' plan has never failed to please its patrons. Investigate."

DON'T MISUSE YOUR HORSE

He is your best friend year in and year out. Buy him a good warm 5-A blanket, and when you leave him standing cover him up. After you have been working or walking and are heat up, you do not stand around in the cold without proper covering. Neither should your horse—he has as much feeling as you, and will appreciate a warm covering as much.

We Buy Direct From The Factory

and can sell first-class Blankets to you at a price less than competitors can buy them from the jobbers. And keep this in mind—Horse Blankets are cheaper to buy than Horse Feed—try this out for a season and you will be money ahead. Remember this store is the place to buy all kinds of horse covering and it means dollars in your pocket if you buy them here.

CHARLEVOIX COURIER

The Leading Newspaper in the Best Little City Anywhere

VOL. 30. NUMBER 49

CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1912

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

ELY ADVOCATES MANY CHANGES

In the State Highway Laws in His Annual Report.

JUST SENT TO THE GOVERNOR

Would Have the State Maintain State Reward Roads.

Believes in Wider Roads—Would Have a Specific Tax on Automobiles for Highway Improvement.

Highway Commissioner Townsend Ely has sent his recommendations for new legislation to Governor Osborn for incorporation in the executive's message. He recommends some important innovations in the highway laws of the state. The most important is the one asking that the state department be given authority to maintain the roads after they are built by the state.

The commissioner says that many roads built under the state reward system by the state and county are allowed to deteriorate by the latter officials who have charge of their upkeep. He advocates that the state pay a small amount per mile for the upkeep of the roads and take charge of the work. State inspectors often find state reward roads that are neglected, but can do nothing.

The commissioner also recommends that the state increase the roads in width. At present the state allows the counties $200 per mile for gravel roads nine feet wide, and $1,000 per mile for macadam of the same width. He advocates that the department be allowed to build the roads as high as 16 feet wide and allow the counties $100 for each additional foot over nine. The commissioner says the nine-foot road is too narrow on the main thoroughfares where there is passing of rigs.

Ely also recommends to the next legislature that the automobile owners be taxed a specific tax and that they be exempted from state license and local tax, and that the proceeds of the specific tax be turned over to the state highway department. He says the automobiles do the most damage to the roads and that the owners should keep them up. He recommends a graduated tax of $5 to $20 per machine. He says the farmers are getting machines and favor the idea.

The state highway department spent $245,000 this year. The department already has applications for 600 miles of state reward road and will need at least $100,000 for 1913. If the 40,000 automobiles are taxed $10 each they would pay the amount. The average $1,000 car now pays a local tax of $20 and a state license of $3.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Will Meet Next Friday Evening at the Home of Miss Emma Bennett.

The Charlevoix Historical society will meet with Miss Emma Bennett Friday evening December 6. The following is the program. Music, Mrs. A. M. Burdick. Paper.

Pictures from Irish History, Mr. H. A. Craig. Social Intermission.

Music. Vocal solo, Dr. Frank Wilkinson. Thomas Moore, Ireland's greatest poet, Miss Annie Metcalf.

New Grocery House.

Art Alcock has purchased the McGough & Morse stock of groceries and opened up for business at the old stand, formerly occupied by the above firm, corner State and Antrim streets.

Mr. Alcock is one of the most experienced grocery men in the city, having long been in the employ of A. E. Mason, and with his knowledge of the demands of the people of Charlevoix and wide acquaintance is sure to meet success.

New goods are arriving daily at C. R. Bellinger's jewelry store. Call and inspect them before purchasing elsewhere.—Advertiser's Club.

BANQUET GIVEN

For Foot Ball Boys at Petoskey by the High School Girls.

The foot ball season in Petoskey was closed November 23, when Petoskey defeated Charlevoix by a score of 58 to 0, each quarter being shortened to ten minutes.

Following the game the two teams, with Coach Lantz of Petoskey and Coach Craig of Charlevoix, assembled at Saville's restaurant and enjoyed a banquet, furnished by 22 of the high school girls. Miss Leota Saville acting as hostess. The shower baths and other conveniences were utilized by the boys, following the game, and all the "foot ballers" were united in their praise of the treatment accorded them. In all, including the young ladies, there were about 60 guests present.

Work is Progressing.

As noted last week plans are being outlined for the forming of a farm bureau in this county, thereby receiving all the benefit of the recent laws extending aid in agricultural extension by the United States Department of Agriculture. If a bureau is formed additional aid will be received from other sources.

WAS CHARMING HOME WEDDING

James A. Hilton and Miss Margery Washburn Form Life Partnership.

Summer Visitor Finds Bride in Charlevoix—Will Make his Future Home in Missouri.

The wedding of James A. Hilton and Miss Margery Eva Washburn, which the Courier announced last week was to take place of Wednesday evening, November 27, was celebrated in the presence of a few intimate friends and relatives, at the home of the bride's parents on Huron street in this city, at 6:30 p. m. on the date named.

It was a simple, yet beautiful wedding. The parlor was tastefully decorated in white and yellow chrysanthemums, interspersed with evergreen, ferns and sunflowers, and the bride and groom stood beneath a floral bell. At the appointed hour Miss Constance Idington, presiding at the piano, struck the opening chords of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, and the procession moved from the rooms above to the nuptial tower. The bride, escorted on the arm of her father, was tastefully gowned in crepe meton, trimmed with yellow and white rosebuds, wore a veil, and carried white bride roses and yellow chrysanthemums. Miss Lila Campbell was bridesmaid, and was charming in white mesaline trimmed with swans down, and carried a beautiful bouquet of white and yellow. The groom had as "best man," his brother, A. Hilton, Jr. Little Miss Henrietta Baldwin was as sweet a flower girl as ever walked in a bridal procession, while Miss Alvera Charlton of Chicago, and the Misses Caro Meach, Ethel Jacobs, Rita O'Neill, Hazel and Marguerite Price of this city carried floral chains between which the procession moved through the parlor. Mrs. C. H. Hampton, of Detroit, sister of the bride, was mistress of ceremonies, and at the appropriate time in the marriage ceremony, sang with splendid voice and expression, Guy D'Hardelot's "Because."

The ring ceremony was used, and the vows were made before Rev. Quinton Walker as officiating clergyman.

After the knot was duly tied, and congratulations extended all around, refreshments of a dainty nature were served, congratulations again extended, and the bride and groom took the train for Petoskey. They came south Thursday afternoon, and were joined by the groom's party, proceeding in Mr. Hilton's private car to Chicago. The young couple will spend several months traveling in the south and west, and will be at home after March 1st in Springfield, Missouri.

The out-of-town guests were as follows: Mr. and Mrs. A. Hilton, of St. Louis, Missouri, parents of the groom; A. Hilton, Jr., brother of the groom; Miss Emily Hilton of Chicago; Miss Alvera Charlton of Chi-

LIFE SAVING STATION

CLOSED SATURDAY NIGHT

Interesting Resume of Work of the Service During the Season—Over Ten Million Dollars Worth of Property and Nearly Nine Thousand Lives Saved in United States—Other Assistance.

The local life saving station closed for the active season at midnight, November 30. The event was celebrated by the serving of a pot luck supper at midnight, to which the crew and their wives did ample justice. After supper, cigars, nuts and candy were passed and all enjoyed a social hour, after which the crew was disbanded, with the best of feeling prevailing.

Accidents that required the services of the crew, during the past season, have been few, when it is taken into consideration that 3919 documentary vessels with a tonnage of 2,554,517 has entered and departed from the local harbor during the year ending November 30 as shown by the record kept at the station. These figures do not take into account row boats, canoes, sail boats and small gasoline pleasure boats; of the latter crafts, the crew rendered assistance on four occasions during the past season by responding to signals for assistance with the power life boat, and taking the persons involved, which were ten, and $1,800 worth of property to a place of safety.

A brief review of the record of the life saving service, for the fiscal year, shows that there were 1,461 vessels involved in disaster. Out of 8,846 persons involved, but 37 were lost, and out of $11,388,515 worth of property involved $10,086,075 were saved.

In addition to this assistance of more or less importance was given to 274 vessels. From station look-outs and from surfmen on beach patrols, timely warnings were given to 219 vessels running into danger.

Success was given at the stations to 49 victims of shipwreck and boating accidents, and furnished a total of 739 days relief.

Aside from the foregoing, there were rescued from drowning 99 persons, who had met with accident while boating and bathing.

Medical and surgical attention, first-aid treatment, was administered to 88 persons suffering from sickness, burns, bruises, broken limbs, gun shot wounds, etc. There were recovered from the water and picked up on the beaches, by the patrol, the bodies of 153 persons who had met death by drowning while bathing, or had fallen off piers, bridges, breakwaters, etc. Assistance was also rendered by the life saving crews at 53 fires which occurred in the immediate vicinity of the stations. Assistance was also given to other branches of the government on 117 occasions and as usual in various other ways were performed services tending to the public good.

TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS

State of Michigan Will Receive From United States for Good Roads.

Postmaster-General Hitchcock and Secretary of Agriculture Wilson have notified Governor Osborn that $10,000 is waiting for the state of Michigan in the U. S. treasury to be appropriated in case the state also contributes $20,000 for the purpose of improving the post-roads of the state, over which rural delivery is effective.

The letter recommends that a 50 mile road traversed by rural carriers be set aside for improvement. The appropriation of $100,000 by congress in the various states for the improvement of post-roads.

Great Newspaper.

As usual the Thanksgiving number of the Christian Science Monitor was one of the greatest newspapers ever published. This year's edition consisted of 96 pages, and besides the regular departments contained many special articles on the progress of the world. It was well filled with advertisements and typographically was well high perfect.

A Correction.

In our account of the death of Ed Hentz last week we stated he was a brother of Mrs. Lou Allard. It should have read Mrs. Charles Allard.

SWIFT RECEIVES HIS SENTENCE

Given From One to Five Years in State Reformatory at Ionia.

Edward Clark Found not Guilty—Disposition of Other Cases on Calendar.

Circuit court opened promptly on time Monday morning and the criminal calendar was taken up.

The case of greatest interest was that of the people vs. Swift, which has been before the people of this county for several years. Swift, who was the founder and superintendent of the Benlah Home for Boys at Boyne City, was convicted, in the circuit court of this county, of serious charges brought against him by boy inmates of the home. An appeal was taken to the supreme court which last month affirmed his conviction and remanded him back to this county for sentence. Tuesday he was brought before Judge Mayne who, after listening to strong pleas for leniency from Swift's attorney, E. N. Clink of East Jordan, and Swift's sister, sentenced him to not less than one year nor more than five years in the Ionia reformatory, where he was taken this morning by Sheriff Robblins.

The outcome of the case is a great victory for A. B. Nicholas of East Jordan, who was prosecutor when the case was brought and has acted as assistant prosecutor in handling the case. Swift's defense has been looked after by the best legal talent to be secured, headed by E. N. Clink, also of East Jordan. We understand that an effort is being made to secure a pardon from the governor.

The case of the people vs. Edward Clark, assault to do great bodily harm less than the crime of murder, was given to the jury yesterday afternoon and resulted in a verdict of not guilty. In this case Clark was charged with emptying the contents of a shotgun into the back of Charles Wheaton. Rollie L. Lewis of this city appeared for the defendant while Prosecuting Attorney Fitch appeared for the people. The following disposition has been made of the other cases on the calendar.

People vs. Watson, violation of liquor law, sentence suspended. People vs. Cummings, bastardy, nolle prosequi. People vs. Nazur, violation of liquor law, continued. People vs. Hunt, violation of liquor law, placed on probation. People vs. Wood, larceny, nolle prosequi.

People vs. Stozak, violation of liquor law, continued. People vs. McSada, violation of liquor law, placed on probation.

People vs. Newhouse, violation of liquor law, placed on probation, re-arrested by United States marshal, taken to Grand Rapids, where he plead guilty before the United States court of sitting liquor illegally and was remanded for sentence.

People vs. Patterson, assault with intent to commit bodily harm less than murder, estranged bail. People vs. Hiltgas, cruelty to animals, estranged bail.

Joseph Minor vs. Richard E. Walker and Fred White, trespass appeal, on trial.

Court adjourned until January 11.

NEW LAW NOW IN EFFECT

Many Changes Made in Regulations Relative to Payment of Pensions.

No Necessity for Separate Vouchers or Receipts From the Pensioner.

Many residents of Charlevoix and Charlevoix county receive pensions from the United States government, and those will be interested to know that, through an act of congress, which recently became a law, pensions will be paid on and after December 1, 1912, except in certain cases, without the necessity of separate vouchers or receipts from the pensioners. The new law leaves only the rule pertaining to the proper delivery of the pension envelope.

It directs that the checks for such payment shall be sent to the pensioner's last known address, and provides further that postmasters, delivery clerks, letter carriers, and other postal employees are prohibited from delivering such mail to any person whatever if the addressee has died or removed or in case of a widow believed by the postal employee to have been remarried.

For purposes of identification, the pension envelope will in the future contain on its face besides the return request a notice to the postmaster containing instructions as to its proper delivery.

The following regulations previously in force, will apply: "Letters from a United States pension agency addressed to a pensioner or a payee of the pension of another person must be delivered in the address personally or to some member of the family specially designated by him or her to receive them. It, however, the addressee has been declared mentally incompetent, they are to be delivered only to his or her duly qualified guardian."

Mr. Nicholas has long been one of the leaders in his profession in Northern Michigan and has served this county several years as prosecuting attorney, making a record as a public official which has never been excelled in that position. His many friends, in every nook and corner of the county, unite with his associates in wishing him all success in his new home.

OLESON-OIXON

Charlevoix County Girl Marries Colorado Fruit Farmer Thanksgiving Day.

A very pretty wedding took place at the country home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dixon, Thanksgiving day, when their youngest daughter, Lillian May was united in marriage by the Rev. Mr. Spears of Ellsworth to Mr. Allick Oleson of Colorado. The bride was beautifully gowned in cream white and carried a bouquet of carnations.

Miss Florence Batch, a niece of the bride, acted as bridesmaid and wore white serge trimmed with satin. The groom wore blue serge. Mr. Fabian Ecklund, a cousin of the groom, acted as best man. Miss Beulah Dixon, a niece of the bride, was ring bearer and wore white trimmed with blue. The bridal party stood behind a bank of flowers and ferns.

The happy young couple will make their future home in Colorado where Mr. Oleson runs an extensive fruit farm. The bride is the youngest of a family of eleven children all of whom have left the old home for the new. About 45 guests were present, all at whom partook of a bounteous Thanksgiving dinner. The bride and groom were presented with many useful and beautiful gifts.

FAREWELL BANQUET GIVEN

To A. B. Nicholas of East Jordan, Who Will Leave County.

AT BAKER'S INN MONDAY NIGHT

By Charlevoix County Bar Association and County Officials.

Mr. Nicholas has long been a leader of bar in Northern Michigan—has faithfully served county.

Monday night the Charlevoix county bar association gave a farewell banquet at Baker's Inn in honor of their president, A. B. Nicholas of East Jordan, who has sold his home in East Jordan, closed out all his business interests and is winding up his legal matters at the present term of court, when he expects to go to Meridian, Mississippi and make his future home. His son, A. B., Jr., and two daughters are already residents of that city.

At the appointed hour the guest of honor was ushered into the dining room where an elaborate banquet table was spread.

Hon. J. M. Harris was "it" at the head of the table which followed the feast and at his command, every member present arose and came across with a speech. County and ex-county officials were specially invited guests and with the Wilkinson quartet assisted the bar in giving Mr. Nicholas an expression of good will and friendliness that will not soon be forgotten.

As a parting anecdote the association presented their guest with a handsome set of cutlery inscribed Charlevoix County Bar.

Mr. Nicholas, in response, referred briefly to his life and work in this county and the causes which compelled him to seek a home elsewhere. He spoke feelingly of his regret that the ties of friendship, of such long standing, were to be interrupted so early in his life, but assured all his friends that, wherever he might be, his heart would constantly be turning back to Michigan and Charlevoix county, which had been so kind to him.

Mr. Nicholas has long been one of the leaders in his profession in Northern Michigan and has served this county several years as prosecuting attorney, making a record as a public official which has never been excelled in that position. His many friends, in every nook and corner of the county, unite with his associates in wishing him all success in his new home.

UNUSUALLY PURE

Analysis of Charlevoix Water as Made by Chemistry Class of High School.

During the past week, the chemistry class of the high school have been engaged in the analysis of water in and about the city, to determine its fitness for drinking purposes, and find the city and mineral well supply entirely sanitary for use, and much better than that found in most cities of Michigan.

The presence of ammonia, either as free or albuminoid, indicates the presence of sewage material and water containing either of both of these is unfit for drinking purposes. Analyses of samples of water as follows:

City supply taken from north side, free ammonia, none; albuminoid ammonia, none. Fit to drink.

City supply taken from south side, free ammonia, none; albuminoid ammonia, none. Fit to drink.

Mineral springs, Bridge street, free ammonia, none; albuminoid ammonia, none. Fit to drink.

Lake Michigan, free ammonia, none; albuminoid ammonia, trace. Probably unfit to drink.

Channel, free ammonia, none; albuminoid ammonia, trace. Probably unfit to drink.

Round lake, free ammonia, trace; albuminoid ammonia, small amount. Unfit to drink.

Century creek, free ammonia, large amount; albuminoid ammonia, large amount. Unfit to drink.

Last Wednesday afternoon Misses Lillian Randall and Myrtle Pearl, both of the class of '12, and Miss Mary Berg, class of '10, called at the normal room. Miss Randall is acting as assistant at the Carnegie library, Miss Pearl is teaching near Eastport, and Miss Berg is teaching at Bay Shore this year.

The class gave a Thanksgiving party to children of the training room last Wednesday afternoon. The children were very active in taking part in the program as they entertained the normal class with several recitations and songs. The class then entertained the children. George Hamlin read the governor's proclamation; Miss Agnes Worth told the story of the Pilgrims which led up to the first Thanksgiving day; the class sang a Thanksgiving hymn; the children told of the different things they were thankful for; and Miss Hazel Gilman, president of the class, had charge of several games indulged in by the normal class as well as the children. Popcorn was served for refreshments.

Coughing at Night.

One bad cough can keep the whole family awake at night. Phil Disorneau, Schaller, Mich., says: "I could not sleep on account of a bad cough, and I was very weak. I used Foley's Honey and Tar Compound, and soon the cough left and I slept soundly all night." Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER III.

Sunset.

ARTHUR answered John's ring and on inquiry informed him that the ladies of the Hampden family were not at home.

"Will you wait, sir?"
"No." And John turned away. He walked out into the country across the bridge at the confluence of North Branch and South Branch, where rises Grant's Knob. He followed the path that leads, corkscrew fashion, to the crest of the knob, and there, in the thick of the shade of a big walnut, leaning against an old boulder that had crowned the knob longer than John could remember, sat the object of his quest.

He had an instant to look at her before she observed him, and smilingly he availed himself of it. And very charming, very alluring she was to his eyes in her light summery gown and the big, soft leghorn hat with its flowers and leaves dangling in the breeze. An open book lay in her lap, but she was not reading. Through half closed eyes she was gazing dreamily at the hills that marched away into the blue distance.

He took a step toward her. She heard him and looked up.

"Hello," he said.

"Good afternoon." Her salutation was very cool indeed.

"Of course if you don't want me to stay—"

"It isn't my bill."

He laughed outright. "Her tactics never vary, it seems," he remarked. "Effective, though. Queer, isn't it, how attractive a girl becomes when she puts on that frigid, speak to me if you dare manner?"

"You were very stupid not to know me the other day."

"But I remembered you."

"You mean you forgot all about me."

"As an impediment, long legged, freckled toady with red hair while you—"

He pouted deliberately.

"My hair was never red," she replied coldly.

Suddenly the clouds broke away. She returned to him with a laugh. "Oh, I can't keep it up. But where did you get your courage? You weren't nearly so brave the other morning. I've been here six days. Why haven't you come to see me?" she demanded.

"Well, you see," he began lamely to explain, "I've had a good many important things to think about and—"

"And I was neither important nor interesting. You need practice, I see."

"But you are."

"You really find me interesting?"

"You know, I've worked hard, very hard, to earn the involuntary generous compliment I am about to receive."

"I do—surprisingly so," he responded promptly.

"You needn't be so surprised," she rejoined. "I was always rather presentable in spite of the freckles, only you wouldn't condescend to notice it. You didn't like me."

"But you were such a pesky little nuisance, you know. Let me see," he added reflectively, "that was—yes, it's been ten years since I last saw you. Not counting the other morning, of course."

"No, eight," she corrected him. "You saw me after the big game, the time you saved the day. You walked right by me, looking straight into my eyes, and never recognized me. You were too anxious to reach Adele Whittington and he made a hero of himself. She was as proud as—no, I'd have been if I'd had the chance—to exhibit you."

"How is Adele?"

"Oh, she's dreadfully thin, is fighting down a tendency to fat, has begun to paint and often asks about you. Are you still in love with her? And am I to eat to talk so about her? And has she had many successors?"

"No to all three questions. She gave me a bad three months, though."

"I'm glad of it," she declared vengefully. "Didn't you know I was terribly in love with you? That's what made me such a pesky little nuisance. Oh, you needn't look so shocked since it was only child love and I have quite recovered. Quite."

So while the golden afternoon waned they exchanged pleasant nonsense. His spirits rose unaccountably. He was very boyish, very gay. Sometimes they skipped lightly and audaciously about from peak to peak of human knowledge. She had traveled much with her father, who, it appeared, had "really learned how to travel," having to make the most of his limited leisure. She knew places not starred in Baedeker, quaint, obscure corners of the earth, full of color. John helped out this part of the talk with questions more or less intelligent. She was pleased to commend his interest.

"One could almost believe you had been there. You would enjoy those places, I know. Not every one does. I'd love to visit, not do, them with you sometime."

"I'd like to very much. But," he answered simply, "I'm afraid it will be a long, long time before I can afford it." She turned and surveyed him thoughtfully. "Now, I like that—the way you said it, I mean. You speak of it in such a matter of fact way, as though the lack or possession of money were really of no great importance to you."

"It slipped out," he confessed. "I don't like to seem to pose. I make enough for my immediate needs, of course, and some day I expect to have more—though not wealth as you probably measure it."

"I'm not sure whether it is really important to me. I do not like the things it buys. But even more I like to think of the power it represents. It's that and the game of getting it that makes men want money in large quantities. Don't you think so?"

He remembered certain rumors he had heard concerning Stephen Hampden's rise to wealth and he put a guard upon his lips.

"I don't know much about it, I fear, which was entirely true. After college I went to law school, then settled here. The family name and father's being a judge helped me to a quick start, I suppose. Since then I have done about as well as the average young lawyer in a small town. That is all. It is very commonplace."

"That doesn't explain why you are wanted by a whole county. It's your chance to escape the commonplace, isn't it? Popularity means power and power is splendid always—I'm primitive, you see. I would use it, I revel in it, make it lift me into the high places. Dad says every one believes you have a big future. Which is good evidence that you have a big future, isn't it?"

"The wisdom of twenty-three," he laughed.

"Oh, you won't take me seriously! Dad says I have the most intrinsically executive mind he ever met. He is very nice about it. He often asks me what I think of things and men."

"And then forms his own opinions?"

"That," she sighed, "is the disappointing fact."

"Did you plan that?" He pointed to a grove of trees on the crest of East ridge, through which gleamed the white stucco walls of that palatial residence so frequently mentioned in the Globe.

"Yes. Do you like it?"

"I haven't seen it except at a distance. But why in New Chelsea?"

"Why not?" she argued, with spirit. "Aren't our hills as beautiful as the Berkshires and the air as fine? Why shouldn't we enjoy the place the money comes from? Dad says a lot of money is to come from this valley in the next few years."

His face became suddenly grave. Thinking of her last words, he looked down at the quaint, old fashioned, drowsy town that lay at the foot of the knob. Far away across the hills hovered a perennial cloud, smoke of Plumville's mills. Already it was being whispered that the saddled return of the captain of finance, the building of the big house with its air of permanence, were not without commercial significance. John was a young man given to sentiment.

"I was thinking of New Chelsea," he said dryly. "So the old order changes. The world of fashion and finance comes knocking at our door. The peaceful valley is to be exploited."

"Can't you see the world moving and New Chelsea with it?"

He was not looking at the shadow but at her, silhouetted against the sky, strong with the strength of youth, whose fathers have tolled close to the soil, eager, pulsating with life, for life. He wondered curiously what manner of woman she was, what lay under the precocious hardness that could see only the picturesque in a ramshackle, poverty stricken Italian village and could dismiss with a careless laugh the fate of a chick in a hawk's clutches.

The line of shadow passed the summit of East ridge. The valley lay in twilight. They watched until the sun sank.

"Shall we go down?"

Together they went slowly down into the valley and his twilight to her home.

"We have now seen," she said, "a sunrise and a sunset together."

"And the evening and the morning were the first day," he quoted smilingly.

"I wonder what the next day holds."

"Aunt Roberta," he laughed, "hopes that I'll fall in love with you."

"How perfectly absurd! Although it might redress the balance, unless," she added demurely, "I should suffer a return of my youthful malady."

"Which would be doubly absurd. It's like chickenpox. Having had one attack, you are thereafter immune."

They laughed gayly.

On the terrace little tables were set and John renewed his acquaintance with Stephen Hampden, a stocky, pleasant voiced man, who no way resembled the warbling, pale, thin, and minor had him. Also was Mrs. Hampden, a lady who tolled her spin, but was always tired and talked in a languid, hazy way. There were also Warren Blake, a chemist and local hero, and his mother, a shy, faded old woman, frightened in the presence of "society folk," but not altogether happy in the Sunday splendor of best black silk and lace.

Mrs. Hampden said Newport would be deprived of the Hampdens' presence that summer, because she had the new house to open and, moreover, preferred to remain with her husband, who had important business matters to oversee.

"She means," Katherine whispered, "that dad caught a tartar in Wall street."

Later the Blakes rose to leave. Warren with surprising tact covering the awkwardness of his mother's farewells, and then, unobtrusively gentle, escorting her away.

Hampden caught his wife yawning daintily. "Well, Maria, since you're so tired, we might as well go in and leave these young people to themselves. The chaplain has no standing in New Chelsea."

After a languid good night to John Mrs. Hampden went, with an air of utter weariness, into the house.

Hampden, however, for the space of an hour, remained on the terrace, chatting pleasantly, during which time John discovered that even Steve Hampden, hard driver of men and daring speculator, had a very likable side and took a mighty pride in his daughter. When the cigar had been tossed away Hampden rose, shaking hands cordially with John.

"I'd better take my own advice. I have to work tomorrow, but don't you miss this fairy night. Come around often, John. And don't let this girl flirt the head from your shoulders."

"I'm already fearful for my peace of mind," John laughed. "But I shall come often, thank you."

It would be evidence of an official surveillance to set down here just how often John Dunmeade journeyed to the ugly house behind the hedge. It was not, however, thanks to the dukes of his candidacy, as often as he would have liked.

But there were other matters demanding the attention of John Dunmeade, nominee for the office of district attorney by grace of the bosses' choice. For he saw an army, whose discipline and weapons and effectiveness caused him to wonder, so far from war. Not with pomp and panoply, that was to come later. This was the time for scout and reconnaissance, for the drawing of maps, the seizing of strategic positions and for numbering the enemy. The enemy—the people—John perceived, made no counter preparations, did not even see the necessity.

Jeremy Applegate one day gave John a new point of view. Jeremy was an old soldier, a cripple, and a clerk in the recorder's office.

"I'm awfully glad," said Jeremy, "that for once I've got to work for a man I got some respect for. I'm a pretty speechless citizen, ain't I?" he exclaimed blithely. "I got a job. Why? I got it because I'm fit for it. Guess you lawyers that have to read my kinkly handwrite know better'n that. It's because I'm an old soldier and a peewee and the kind of string that'll go round whittin' to his friends about his job sets to get them to vote the ticket. Yessir, I'm that kind. I fit for my country all right, but I did it because it was my duty, not so's to

HOLDEN LEAVES IOWA COLLEGE

The "Corn Man" Joins I H C Service Bureau.

TO HELP PUSH WORK FORWARD

Co-Operation Movement for Larger Crops, Better Roads, More Prosperous People and a Better Nation.

This marks the beginning of a new and greater business service. It is a co-operative movement for larger crops, better roads, happier homes, more prosperous people, and a richer and better nation. That is to say, the I H C Service Bureau proposes to help do for all the states and for Canada what Holden has done for Iowa.

After considering many offers, and after an investigation of the company and its works, Professor Perry G. Holden has entered the service of the I H C Service Bureau at Chicago.

Professor Holden is known wherever real agriculture is known. His whole life is one of service. He originated the idea of carrying information direct to farmers. He is the father of the demonstration train, short school courses, the corn show, county demonstration farms, and the National Corn Belt Union. As head of the extension department of Iowa State College of Agriculture he did a work which Senator Chapman says, up to the present time has been unequalled in the history of the state.

The object of the I H C Service Bureau is the promotion of agricultural education and a cooperation which will lead to the wholehearted commercial, industrial and farm work. Since agriculture is the basis of prosperity and progress, naturally farm problems claim first attention. There is higher efficiency, both on and off the farm.

To do a big work a big organization is necessary. Not only the business, but the perfection of the International organization as well as applied to Professor Holden. The big general agencies, scattered all over the United States and Canada, the salesmen, travelers and expert machine men, the 40,000 dealers—every one, so far as possible, is to be made an apostle of better farming.

For years the International Harvester Company has realized the importance of service. It has spent millions of dollars in the perfection of its harvesting machines, and now the company is going in for direct service—direct to the farmers, and direct to the farmers' children, that the men and women of tomorrow may be more capable and so more prosperous than the men and women of today.

It is no longer a theory that if we are to get the most out of life we must raise more per acre. "Intensive farming" is in the air. It is the battle cry of peace and plenty. But raising more is the result of intelligent, we must know. And not only that, we must know we know, and know why we know. We must know good seed from bad, right cultivation from wrong, and the why and whereof of climates, soils, fruits, cattle, horses, poultry, and so forth.

For these things the bureau was established, but the bureau and Professor Holden see more than an average increase of a few bushels. They see a time coming when farmers will raise twice as many bushels of corn, wheat and oats to the acre, and like yields of all other kinds of farm products. They see a time when farmers and farmers' wives and their children will think more and work less. Every bushel raised means less that much profit, and the profits of the farm promote commerce and industry.

After a period of good work in Michigan, where he had been at work at Illinois, and a great deal of work at Iowa, Professor Holden now enters upon a world's work. He is to be a professor in the I H C Service Bureau as home, he is to be a traveling lecturer, and he is to be a part of the rest of the world.

After what would you do if you were a man? That is the question to yourself. Boston Transcript.

SUDDEN DEATH

Deer Lake Girl Taken Ill on Train and Dies in Cadillac Depot.

Laura Shifors, aged nineteen, of Deer Lake, was taken from a north-bound G. R. & I. train at Cadillac, Saturday, and placed upon a depot bench; a few moments later she died; her parents rushed to see her mother dying upon her lips.

She was a victim of the white plague. Last July she was sent to Deer Lake where she lived with an uncle. Recently she had an attack of pneumonia but recovered and begged to be permitted to go home. She was taken seriously ill soon after boarding the train and was taken from the train at Cadillac with the above result.

be able to get a job and beg for votes afterward. I was a man then. Now I'm a parasite. For nigh onto twenty years I've done it, because I can't make a living any other way; for good men and bad men, for them I can respect—mostly for them I can't respect. I ain't allowed a mind of my own nor conscience, and every time I go comin' I feel like a pup. Do you know what it is? It's hell, that's what it is."

"What we need," said John, "is civi service."

"Civi service? They've got civi service in the postoffice. Did you ever hear of a postmaster or his clerk that wasn't in politics?"

But a grinning soldier often is a good fighter; witness Jeremy on a scouting expedition. It begins at the establishment of Sims Hicks, heavy man, Jeremy, being a pecker, cannot tramp the weary miles ahead of him.

He drives out into the country, brow wrinkled as he marshals his arguments. He has no eyes for the calm beauty of the afternoon. He milks in the logging horse beside a field in the middle of which a man is seen driving a hayrack. In response to Jeremy's hail the man descends from his seat and walks slowly over to the fence.

"Howdy, comrade," says Jeremy.

"Howdy, Jeremy."

"Good harvest? weather."

"Pretty good," comrade agrees. There is not a cloud in the sky.

"Smoke?" suggests Jeremy. From a bulging pocket he draws forth a cigar, grinded by a gaudy red and gold band. They are very good cigars, costing $2.50 the hundred. At home repose three boxes of them, recently purchased. Jeremy has needed a new suit and his wife a new dress for more than a year. These luxuries, however, must be postponed.

The farmer holds the cigar to his nose, sniffing approvingly. "I'll keep it till after supper." He deposits it carefully on the bottom rail of the fence beside his water jug.

Jeremy resorts again to the bulging pocket. "Keep that and smoke this now," he offers generously. The farmer lights the cigar. From another pocket Jeremy draws forth his own weed. This pocket is not so well filled, and contains only "three fers" for Jeremy's own consumption.

After further preliminaries Jeremy opens fire.

"Spose you're goin' to git into line this fall, same as ever, comrade?" he remarks casually.

The farmer leans on the fence in an attitude suited to comfortable argument. "Well, I don't know's I am."

"With Johnny Dunnende—on the ticket?"

"I'll vote for him. He's all right. Does my law work. I don't think much of the state ticket, though."

Forthwith Jeremy launches into a passionate defense of his party, in which the tariff is freely mentioned. Reference is made also to the shrew when comrade and he shared blankets together on the red soil of Virginia. He talks rapidly, desiring to leave the argument which he cannot answer. Comrade is not unimpressed, but is far from conviction.

"Well, I don't know," he says slowly. And then brings forth the thing that has been haunting Jeremy's nights and days. "I'm bothered some about that trust company business. Looks to me as if some of Murchell's politicians was at the bottom of it. When they git to foalin' with our tanks, it's time to make a change. If we let 'em go on, how'n I to know that my bank ain't mixed up with 'em?"

There is a silence, while Jeremy hunches himself for his duty. "I know it—it's been botherin' me, too. But," he looks away and tries manfully to keep the whine out of his voice. "I'm askin' you as a favor to me to over look it. They've sorted notice on me that I've got to bring in my list for the whole ticket or my job goes."

There is another silence, a longer one, while the farmer chews his cigar reflectively.

"Well," he says at last, "I'd like to do ye a favor, Jeremy. I'll think it over."

X.—Separators and Treatment of Cream.

By LAURA ROSE,
Demonstrator and Lecturer in Dairying at the Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, Canada.

(Copyright, 1911, by A. C. McClurg & Co.)

THE invention of the cream separator gave a great impetus to the butter industry and revolutionized the handling of milk and cream.

Many ask the question, "Which is the best make of separator?" All the standard makes have good points, and the question sifts down to a matter of small details, which appeal differently to different people. In buying a separator select a good skimmer, one that turns easily, is well made of good wearing material, not too complicated in construction, easy to clean, convenient as to height of cream and skim milk spouts and sufficiently large for the size of the herd.

It must be remembered there is a vast difference between machines of the same make, and a purchaser should satisfy himself that his machine is a clean skimmer and a smooth, easy runner before closing the bargain.

The machine should not be set up in a stable. Occasionally one sees a separator in an empty cow stall. This is bad. It is convenient to have a small room fitted up for the machine near to or in the stable. Such a room should be well ventilated and clean and the floor tight.

Firm Foundation Needed.

The foundation of the separator should be firm. Even a slight vibration injures such a finely constructed piece of machinery. For the same reason the machine should stand perfectly level. A small piece of quarter inch rubber packing, placed under the legs before fastening, improves the running of any separator. Keep all parts clean. Every week or two run a little kerosene through the oil chamber to remove the thick grease and accumulated dirt from the bearings, but do not fail to oil the machine well afterward. Coal-oil is not a lubricant, simply a cleanser. Use only the oil furnished for the machine or one of equally fine quality.

When starting the machine get up speed gradually. Put the same pressure on the handle during the entire circle of it and sustain an even speed. For close skimming run the machine a few turns above the tabulated speed rather than below. Slow speed is the cause of much poor skimming.

Before turning on the milk put enough hot water through the machine to wet and warm the bowl thoroughly. This insures cleaner skimming and prevents the cream from sticking to the skimming device. Do not allow the milk to set too low in the receiving can or the cream outlet may clog. The inflow of milk into the bowl should be steady and should be approximately to the capacity of the machine. If for any reason the machine has to be left before the run is finished shut off the flow of milk and if convenient flush out the bowl with a little warm water to prevent the cream outlet from clogging. At the end of the run enough warm water should be put through the bowl to force the cream out. This water must be pure, for some of it of necessity gets into the cream, but allow only what is necessary to flush the cream from the bowl. Too hot water will seal the milk on the bowl and make it hard to clean. Skim milk may be used for flushing out the bowl, but warm water is better.

Always Strain Before Separating.

Milk should always be strained before separating. The sooner the dirt is removed the better. Moreover, hairs, small pieces of straw, etc., are apt to close the outlets. Putting two thick pieces of cheesecloth over the receiving can and holding them in place with several clothespins is a convenient method.

Milk is at its best for separating immediately after being drawn from the cows. Should it cool below 85 degrees it is better to warm it, although some machines do good skimming at a lower temperature, but there is always a risk of losing cream when the temperature of the milk is low.

Should the milk supply become so small that it seems hardly worth while starting up the machine the night's milk may be held till the morning, but to preserve the quality it should be quickly cooled as soon as milked. This held over milk should have the cream well stirred in and be heated to 100 degrees or over, for no harm, but really good results from having the milk hot. Run it through after the morning's milk has been separated. This practice has its disadvantages.

There is one point that must be remembered. The machine must be thoroughly cleaned after each time of using. First rinse the parts which come in contact with the milk in warm water, then wash in hot water in which some washing powder has been dissolved. Use the brushes provided by the manufacturers to clean the different parts. Rinse in scalding water and place on a rack to drain dry. Never use a drying cloth. The hot water should be sufficient.

Do not subject the rubber ring to too hot water. Heat ruins rubber.

The separator brushes should be frequently scalded in a strong soda solution to keep them sweet. Have a square of cloth to throw over the frame of the machine after it has been wiped. This prevents dust getting in the bearings.

A machine should not leave over 65 per cent fat in the skim milk, when properly managed. When the loss exceeds this it is time to look for a cause. Real good skimming does not leave over .02 per cent.

It is a good plan occasionally to make a test of both the skim milk and the cream. The fact that no cream rises on the skim milk overnight is a sign that a separator is doing good work. When making butter on the farm in the barrel churn I would leave the cream test from 24 to 28 per cent fat, but if it is to be sent to the creamery have it from 30 to 35 per cent. It is our duty to help the creameryman all we possibly can. By sending him a rich cream we do much toward making the butter a better quality.

Where eight or ten cows are kept on a machine with a capacity of not less than 500 pounds per hour. All machines, except the smaller sizes, are so constructed that they may be connected with power.

Very often when the cows freshen in the spring and when the grass stimulates the milk flow no change is made in the adjustment of the cream screw. Usually the fresher the cows in milk and the heavier the flow the lower the percentage of fat, and so the necessity for turning in the screw, so as to have less skim milk in the cream.

Pasteurization of Cream.

Pasteurization, while not removing all the bits which are apt to be in cream, helps to a great extent.

For creamery work the practice cannot be too highly recommended.

On the farm, where conditions are under one's special supervision and

HANDY WEIGHING AND SAMPLING APPARATUS FOR TESTING COWS

control, it is not necessary to pasteurize, nor do we advocate it.

To pasteurize cream place the can containing it in a vessel of hot water. Stir the cream occasionally and bring it to a temperature of 175 degrees. Authorities give a range of temperatures from 160 to 185 degrees. Leave it covered at that temperature for twenty minutes. It will cool very little if just lifted out of the water. Then rapidly cool to 60 degrees or below.

To sterilize cream or milk heat it to 212 degrees, the boiling point. This temperature is supposed to make it germ free. Sterilized milk is not so digestible as raw milk or pasteurized milk.

If a reputation for good butter is to be established and maintained it is the farmer who has to do it.

Have the cream sweet and delicate in flavor. Avoid feeds that will taint the milk. Do not feed turnip tops or rape. Do not imagine turnips can be eaten by the cows, even after milking, and not affect the quality of the butter. Turnips have their place, but it is not on the menu of a milking cow.

Milk from freshly calved cows should not be skimmed until after the eighth milking.

Put an ice and study the problem of keeping the cream cold. The temperature must be kept low, 50 degrees or under, in summer and the cream quickly cooled after separating. In winter as well as in summer. Each skimming of cream should be cooled before mixing with that already cooled. If water is scarce for cooling purposes the cream may be put in shallow pans and set in a cool, clean cellar on a stage or cement floor. The stone and cement are good conductors of heat and soon reduce the temperature by drawing the heat from the cream.

It is best to have the cream delivered at the creamery every day in summer, or at least three times a week, and not less than twice weekly in winter.

The farmer's aim should be to send cream testing from 30 to 35 per cent fat.

When cream is taken to a creamery there is usually quite a little talk about the "overrun," and frequently the term is not understood.

The overrun consists of the pounds of butter made over the pounds of fat in the milk or cream. This difference between the fat and the butter is made up of water, salt and casin or soap and varies under different regulations.

The average overrun is about 15 per cent, for many creameries do better.

FARM POULTRY HOUSE.

Convenient, Sunny Location and Good Drainage Are Essential Points.

Good growth of poultry and heavy egg production depend in a large extent upon the proper housing of the stock. A bulletin issued by the Iowa agricultural experiment station sets forth the essentials of a good house in brief form.

The first consideration in building a poultry house is its location. It is of greatest importance to select a site having well drained soil. It is next important to have a convenient location. The poultry house may be located near the residence than the live stock barn, and as women have a large share in the management of the flock on the average farm it should be so located. It is undesirable to build the poultry house near granaries, cribs or barns which may furnish a harbor for rats and other vermin which prey on poultry. A sunny location well sheltered from the north winds is highly desirable when ever it is possible to obtain it without sacrificing good ground drainage.

The Ashraved portable colony house illustrated is cheap and light and has been thoroughly tried out and found to be very satisfactory for raising chicks in flocks of 200 to 300. It will winter from fifteen to twenty hens. The house is 8 by 10 feet and because of its lightness and substantial construction it can be readily moved from place to place on the sleds which furnish the foundation for the house. It is warm and convenient, and the fowls are well protected from drafts.

NEEDS OF THE FARM.

There are two crying needs of the farm at the present time, the need of better methods of production and a more satisfactory manner of disposing of the products.

THINKING OF CHRISTMAS.

Now Is the Time to Prepare For Turkeys For Next Fall and Winter.

Do you remember the price of turkeys last Christmas? You surely do, and you'll think about it next Christmas, too. If you don't "start" your turkeys now, you can have a double gain by rearing a brood on the farm this summer. They feed on grasshoppers and other insects almost to the extent of a complete diet, thus helping to dispose of the grasshopper pest and at the same time getting food for themselves.

MANURE SPREADER'S WORTH.

Helps to Do Away With Wasteful Methods of Piling Fertilizer.

When two years ago I purchased a manure spreader neighbors laughed at me and said I could not use it on my farm, says a correspondent of the Country Gentleman. Since they have seen it work, however, and observe the results from it nearly all of them have bought spreaders for their own farms. I regard this as the most useful and economical piece of machinery on my farm.

My experience with it teaches me that it is far easier to haul the manure out every day than to follow the old Photograph by United States department of agriculture.

WASTEFUL METHOD OF STORING MANURE.

practice of throwing it out in a pile. When the manure is applied with a spreader it is put on uniformly, and all parts of the field are equally benefited. When the manure was dumped in piles it frequently happened that the work of spreading was postponed for some time, and the result was that much of the fertilizing powers of the manure leached out or were lost through fermentation.

The manure spreader saves not only the plant food elements in the manure, but also time and labor, since the work is done all at one time. It does two very important things and does them well: it thoroughly pulverizes the manure, no matter how coarse, and distributes it finely and evenly in a form in which it can at once do its work. Secondly, manure spreaders have great manure than they want, and instead of piling it up as a means of disposing of it, they can use it as a fertilizer. It is a sure way to get rid of it with the least possible labor.

If farmers would only give the spreader a trial and carefully observe the good it does they would never be without one. When stable and barnyard manure is applied by using the spreader the effect on meadows and other crops is much better than when it is spread with a fork. The increased results will frequently pay for the machine in one year.

Manure should not be allowed to lie outside the barn very long, for it will lose much of its value. In order to get the most out of it as a soil fertilizer it should be soon as made be hauled out on to the field and spread. No farmer can afford to allow manure to waste when his soil needs it badly. I keep a great many hens and have a considerable amount of hen manure. For distributing this the spreader is excellent, and for this purpose, if for no other, I should have one. A spreader will pay for itself in a short time.

A little farm well tilled is better than broad acres to be grown up in weeds. Farmers are losing millions every year trying to cultivate too much land. Try fewer acres better cultivated.

Feathers as a Byproduct.

Late reports from Missouri are interesting as showing the amounts realized in that state in a single year through the sale of feathers. Labor Commissioner Austin W. Hayes in the red book for 1911 gives complete figures for the feather sales of 1910 and shows that this "byproduct of the poultry yard" has been an important factor in enabling Missouri to retain her title as "poultry queen of the Union." His figures show that in 1910 1,280,107 pounds of feathers were sold which brought $300,236.—Iowa Homestead.

Economic Farming.

I have seen and so poor that it would grow nothing without a good application of manure made in 20 years, so full of manure in the present application of manure that it would feel springy like moss to the foot. Then it responded gloriously to the manure. It is the key to the door of factors that supports economic farming.—Cor American Agriculturist.

The Horse's Hoofs.

If the horse's hoofs are hard and inclined to be "shelly" do not let anybody put oil or grease on them, for this only clogs the hoof material, which should absorb water instead of repelling it. Soft hoofs are best treated by soaking them several hours together in warm water slightly salted or by pouring oil on the hoofs at night in a pasture where the horse will have the hoofs wet in the dew.—Farm Progress.

THEATRICAL

Remember the first number of the lecture course December 10. The Hussars will be the opening attraction. Everywhere they have appeared they have received enthusiastic comments.

The Oneonta (N. Y.) Daily Star of October 19th says: "The Oneonta Normal and Public School lecture course opened most auspiciously last evening with a unique and pleasing entertainment by the Hussars, composed of nine young men who are talented musicians and who unitedly gave a most enjoyable musical. The large audience gathered gave emphatic evidence of appreciation and approval of their efforts in entertainment by the most enthusiastic applause ever accorded a like entertainment. The concert opened with an overture by the company." This paper goes on at length to describe the success of the program.

Postoffice Department Makes Estimate of Number of Stamps Needed.

EFFECTIVE JANUARY THE FIRST

Rate Varies With the Weight and Distance Parcel is Carried.

Distinctive Stamps Must be Used on all Parcels—Other Information of Much Value to Patrons.

Uncle Sam is preparing to handle parcels through the mails at rates that will make the transportation companies, at least, take notice.

In order to form an estimate of the number of stamps necessary to inaugurate the new system, letters are being sent out broadcast by the P. O. Department of which the following is an excerpt.

The parcel post law which becomes effective January 1, 1913, provides:

"That hereafter fourth-class mail matter shall embrace all other matter, including farm and factory products, not now embraced by law in either the first, second or third class not exceeding eleven pounds in weight, nor greater in size than seventy-two inches in length and girth combined, nor in form or kind likely to injure the person of any postal employee or damage the mail equipment or other mail matter and not of a character perishable within a period reasonably required for transportation and delivery."

For the purpose of carrying this law into effect the United States is divided into zones with different rates of postage applicable to each,
as follows:

weight	1 zone	2 zone	3 zone	4 zone	5 zone	6 zone
1 lb.	$0.05	$0.05	$0.05	$0.05	$0.05	$0.05

The local rate is applicable to parcels intended for delivery at the office of mailing or on a rural route starting therefrom.

It will be observed that the rates of postage are largely reduced, and that the limit of weight is increased from four to 11 pounds. Parcels will be delivered at all free-delivery offices and to patrons residing on rural and star routes; they may be registered and may be accorded special delivery service on payment of the usual fees, and they may be insured against loss in an amount equivalent to their actual value, but not to exceed $25, upon payment of a fee of five cents. Distinctive stamps must be used on all parcels, but they may be mailed in quantities of not less than 2,000 identical pieces without stamps affixed, the postage being paid in money.

BADLY HURT IN ACCIDENT

Harrison Wallace Loses Right Foot by Falling Under Cars.

Toes on Left Foot Severed—Had Worked But Few Days When Accident Happened.

Last Tuesday W. H. Wallace received word from Salisbury, Ontario, that his son, Harrison, had been badly hurt in a railroad accident, and immediately left for that place.
Upon reaching Salisbury, he found that he had been taken to the St.
Joseph hospital at Perry Sound, and immediately went there.

In an interview with Mr. Wallace it was learned that Harrison, his son, upon his arrival in the north, had went to work for the C. P. Ry.
as checking agent, but as the pay was small, had asked to be transferred to some position where the pay was higher. He was then transferred to a construction gang, and given the position of time keeper.
After three days work in this position, a heavy snow storm made it impossible to proceed with the construction work, and Harrison was given a position as brakeman on a 300 mile run. He was on his third trip when the accident occurred.

From what can be learned, the accident happened as the train was leaving a station and Harrison, as rear brakeman, was turning a switch. He accomplished this, and as the train was going at a rapid rate, had to run to catch it. It was about three o'clock in the morning and very dark, and being unfamiliar with the location, Harrison ran into the end of a bridge, and in falling, rolled under the rear car.

When picked up by the train crew, it was found that his right foot had been cut off just above the ankle, and the toes on his left foot were severed by the wheels of the cars. He was at once given medical attention and taken to the hospital at Perry Sound.

The accident is a sad one, and it will be three or four months before he will be able to leave the hospital.

BETTER BREED OF FOWLS ARE SHOWN EACH YEAR

Three Hundred Birds on Exhibition at the Charlevoix Poultry Association Exhibit—
Good Work Being Done by Association—Many Exhibitors Deserve
Special Mention—A. J. Usher Wins Silver Cup.

The Third annual exhibition of the Charlevoix Poultry association, which ended last Saturday, was a success from all standpoints.
Nearly three hundred birds were entered by fanciers from Charlevoix, Petoskey and Boyne City. All the leading varieties of chicken were shown, and it was quite evident from the exhibitions made, that a better breed of fowls has been the result from the exhibitions made by the association.

Some of the best exhibits were those of the Barred Rock class by E. J. Hiller and Dr. J. A. Auld, Black Langshans by H. D. Marshall, White Rocks by R. C. Korth, White Wyandottes by Samson Goddard and Dr. G. E. Reyeralt, Rhode Island Reds by Whitney & Davey of Petoskey, and Black Orpingtons by A. J. Usher. In the other lines not mentioned it was shown that the owners were breeding along lines that were producing fine exhibition birds.

Judge R. V. Otto of Middleton acted in his official capacity in a manner that was satisfactory to all,
and in many instances it was difficult to make a decision as to the winners, but all were satisfied with the decisions made by him.

The silver cup valued at $25.00 put up by the association for the large-est and best display of any one variety of fowls was won by A. J.
Usher on his exhibition of Black Orpingtons.

The officers of the show are more than pleased with the success of the exhibition, and will undoubtedly make arrangements for its continuance. The attendance was far below what the show was entitled to, when one takes into consideration the good work the association is accomplishing.

SCHOONER ROUSE SIMMONS LOST

Was Bound for Chicago Loaded With Christmas Trees.

Crew of Sixteen Believed to Have Been Lost—Was Owned at Beaver Island.

The three-masted schooner Rouse
Simmons, with Captain Herman Schmiedeman and crew of sixteen has been given up as lost by shipping interests and government marine officials.

Mich., November 21, bound for Chicago with Christmas trees, which have constituted an annual cargo for 30 years. In the tonight just past there have been several severe storms on the lake.

The belief that the schooner "sank" with all on board has been strengthened by a report from Port Water-men at Port Huron, Mich., that Mich., that Christmas trees and a lazarette hatch had been found on shore, washed in by the high waves of the recent storm.

The Rouse Simmons was a venerable craft of only 700 tons burden, owned by J. C. Bonner, of St. James, Mich. Among the crew was Charles Nelson, a former sea captain, who joined Captain Schmiedeman to assist him in weathering the gales which were expected.

Now at Miller's Grocery.

Hert VanAlsburg, who for some time has been conducting a meat market at the corner of Autumn and State streets, has moved into the market recently vacated by H. R.
Fowler in the Miller grocery. Mr.
VanAlsburg states that in his new location he will be better equipped than before to take care of his trade, and will keep a larger line of meats than heretofore. His phone number will be the same as the Miller grocery, 102, and he extends a cordial invitation to his former as well as new customers to call on him in his new location.

WILL INCREASE WEALTH

Agricultural Extension Work and Establishing of County Farm Bureau.

In connection with the movement to establish a farm bureau in this county it may be interesting to note what has been done in the south by the fostering and pushing of scientific agricultural extension work, by the department of agriculture, such as it is supposed to do now all over the United States.

In South Carolina interest was aroused by means of boys' corn clubs and Jerry Moore, by raising 221 bushels to the acre, became the champion corn raiser of the world.
We remember when an offer was made, about a couple of years ago, of a prize of $50 each to the boy raising the best acre of corn and the best acre of trees, and no boy entered. Now we believe it would be different and by means of the teaching of elementary agriculture in our schools and the establishing of farm bureaus, such as is pur-posed, the wealth of Michigan will be increased. It is said that the boys' corn clubs of South Carolina increased the wealth of that state $20, 000,000. Shouldn't we all push the project of a farm bureau?

WILL RESIDE AT SAGINAW

Scroggie-Heath Marriage Culmination of School Day Romance.

Wedding Took Place at Home of Groom's Brother
—One Hundred Guests Were Present.

As an announcement in last week's Courier the wedding of Miss Gertrude E. Heath and Lee Scroggie was to take place Wednesday afternoon, at five o'clock. At the appointed hour the wedding was solemnized at the home of the groom's brother, William Scroggie, Jr., in the presence of nearly one hundred guests, many of whom were received from out of town, who were received by Mrs. William Scroggie, Sr., and Mrs. William Scroggie, Jr. The house was most beautifully decorated in carnations and similar.

To the strains of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, skillfully played by Miss Doris Kane, the bridal party headed by—Rev. Quinton Walker, the officiating clergyman, followed by the groom and best man, his brother, Dean, and next the ring bearer, little Valdean Scroggie, nephew of the groom, who carried the ring in a hilly, took their places.

Then down the stairs came the maid of honor, Miss Winifred Weaver, tastefully gowned in pale yellow crepe-de-chine and beaded net, carrying a bouquet of white carnations. She was followed by bride, who was beautifully dressed in white hand embroidered elusion over mulline, with a crown of roses. The bridal veil hung gracefully to the hem of her dress. She carried a bridal bouquet and was met at the head of the stairs by her father, William W. Hoyle of St.
James, who gave her away. After the ceremony congratulations were extended and a dainty buffet lunch was served with Mrs. George W.
Priest and Mrs. Lou Comfort presiding, while the Misses Elsie See, Etta O'Neil and Mildred Johnson assisted in serving.

They left at seven o'clock by auto for Petoskey where they caught the night train for Grand Rapids and Detroit, where they will make a week's visit before going to Saginaw where a home is in readiness for them.

SHOULD NOT BE PARDONED

Herman L. Swift Deserves More Than Sentence Imposed by Court.

CRIME WAS A REVOLTING ONE

Was Convicted in a Fair Trial and Should Serve His Sentence.

Friends Making a Determined Effort to Have Him Pardoned—Monster Petition Will be Sent to Governor in Protest.

About a week ago it was rumored that Governor Osborn would either pardon or parole Herman L. Swift of the Beniah Home at Boyne City.
A few days after this report it was learned that the governor had placed Swift on a ten days parole to allow him to visit his "dying wife" at Chicago.

It is fresh in the minds of our readers that last week Judge Mayne sentenced Swift to serve a sentence of not less than one year nor more than five years at Ionia. At the time sentence was made, Judge Mayne told Swift that he would suspend sentence for a month or even two months, if the conditions in his home were as represented, but for some reason Swift did not accept the offer, probably knowing at that time that the efforts made by his southern Michigan friends to obtain his pardon or parole would be successful. Hardly had the prison doors been closed upon him before the governor turned him loose for ten days, and Prosecuting Attorney Fitch was notified by telegram to appear at Lansing Thursday and show cause, if any there should be, why he (Swift) should not be pardoned.

Herman L. Swift was tried about two years ago and convicted of one of the most revolting crimes, but the case was taken to the supreme court, where it has hung up to a week or so ago and finally the verdict of the lower court was sustained. This being the case, there was nothing to do but sentence him according to law. In the judgment of a majority of the people, the sentence was too light, and should have had as much attached to it as least large enough to reimburse the county for the heavy expenses of the trial.

Swift was given a fair trial and found guilty, and that he had also been indicted in Chicago and in Jackson county for similar offenses before he came to the home at Boyne City. He has now enlisted the services of his board of directors in his behalf, all of whom are his personal friends, and who will try to save him from serving the time that the court imposed. The evidence of guilt in the case was convincing, but now that this work has been accomplished, a still graver problem arises which should not be lost sight of by the governor when the case is laid before him.
The crime charged against him and for which he was convicted, was a most revolting one, and was made more heinous because of the hypocritical pretensions of Swift.

The Beniah home is an institution that has done a great deal of good in this part of the state. Furthermore, it is supported by the public which has an interest in its future that the governor nor any other person can afford to ignore.
The homeless boys who are placed in the home are entitled to the very best bringing up that is possible to give them, and a man of the stripe that Swift has been proven to be, has no moral right to beat the head of it. His usefulness at the head of the home has ceased, and no governor's pardon can ever wipe out the stain from his life, or restore him to usefulness as a member of "boys' lives." The home should be kept intact, but the people of the state of Michigan do not want such a man as Herman L. Swift to be responsible for the shaping of the young lives that are given into the keeping of the institution.

A monster petition is being circulated in this city which will be sent to Governor Osborn, protesting against his pardon of Herman L. Swift.

H. V. Rilenburg started for Florida Monday. We wish him a safe journey and a pleasant winter in the sunny South.

The little boys and girls had a surprise party on Mark Saunders Saturday. Seventeen were present and had a merry time.

Frank Hammond had his foot badly hurt last Wednesday, by a runaway horse. We are glad to report it is getting better.

Three new pictures have been added to the grammar room, "The Madonna of the Chair" by Raphael, "John of Arc" and "Too near the Warpath."

Friday afternoon, the girls of the upper grades held a "Spread" in honor of the boys, much to their surprise, cocoa, sandwiches, cookies and cakes were served.

So here bath been dawning
Another blue day;
Think, wilt thou let it Slip uselessly away?

Out of Eternity
This new day was born
Into Eternity
At night will return.

Parish Clerks as Actors.

In the fourteenth century the parish clerks of London frequently took a part in the miracle plays, then commonly acted in churches, and also annually performed mystery plays in public near the old clerk's well, which gave its name to Clerkenwell. Occasionally they even acted before royalty. Thus Hollushed records that the London parish clerks of the Brotherhood of St. Nicholas, who formerly were a dignified body with a chartered guild and hall of their own in Bishopsgate street, performed a play on three successive nights before Richard II and his queen and court to divert the royal resentment against the citizens of London for a recent riot in the city.

CULTIVATE CORN LATE.

Best implement to use is a Harrow of Adjustable Width.

The mistake is too often made of "laying by" corn too early. Our experience has taught us that it pays to cultivate corn late. It is highly important to conserve the soil moisture by shallow cultivation. Weeds should not be allowed to rob the plants of nourishment, nor should it be agreeable work in cultivating the corn drier us from keeping up tillage. If you have never tried late cultivation give it a trial this year.

The best implement for tilling corn late is a harrow which may be adjusted in width. This should have handles and be operated carefully to avoid disturbing the roots of the plants. Use one gentle horse and run one time between two rows. This destroys weeds, that make their appearance and leaves an effective dust mulch to reduce loss in soil moisture.

The practice of leaving the middles exposed with a deep furrow should be carefully avoided. The entire row should be mulched, and the land should be as nearly level as possible. Keep up the mulch until your corn is in "roasting ears."—Texas Farm and Ranch.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER IV. The Nazario.

MANY years before there had come to New Chelsea a sheep-herd to lead the Presbyterian flock and to die, leaving his wife, a shy, plain little woman, and her son, to struggle with the problem of existence. She must have struggled effectively, for New Chelsea bears witness that never was recourse had to its ready charity. Some credit must be given to the son who, when public school days were over, bent himself to the plow; a moon-faced lad who blunked uncomprehendingly at the lessons and pranks of his former schoolmates. Slow, patient, unobtrusive, of the sort that despite sundry time honored maxims usually finds recognition reluctant, he yet won it quickly.

When those of his generation whose fathers had been able to provide a college education returned on the threshold of manhood to begin life, they found Warren Blake already in the eyes of his neighbors, a successful assistant cashier of the bank and owner of certain small mortgages, but not at all boastful over it. He combined even when he became cashier, modesty with a man who had become a model young man. He was a literal man who took all things seriously. His duty to his bank, his trusteeship of the Presbyterian church, he was rarely known to neglect.

After thirty-five years' residence in New Chelsea had found no explanation of him. It was admitted that he had a peculiar way of doing things, for some of his plans, had failed in the "stomach" of the community. And it continued to be a mystery. Warren Blake was known for his organization of his life with his executive of his best will and means and his respect for his relatives, which trusts he always rendered prompt and exact accounts.

And now, all New Chelsea knew, he and Stephen Hampden were organizing a company of fallacious capitalism to work the coal fields.

One morning in mid July Warren was seated at his desk. The day had already become hot and stifling.
The clerks at the counter grumbled profusely at the rule, promulgated by Warren, that forbade them to appear coatless, and glanced nervously through the plate glass partition at the cashier, very handsome and cool looking in his light gray suit, socks and necktie to match. He was reading, with a show of care that overlooked no syllable, the papers on the desk. When he had read them he arranged them in two neat piles, the piles, which he labeled "Options Granted" and "Options Refused."

As this task was completed Stephen Hampden entered the bank, with a pleasant and in reply to the clerks' respectful greeting. He made his way into the cashier's office.

"Phew!" he whistled, drawing a chair up to the desk. "It's a hot day, isn't it? Have you the options?"
Warren pushed the two piles of documents toward him. At one Hampden merely glanced; the other, "Options Refused," he opened and read rapidly.
"H-m-m! All Deer township propties. Why won't they sign?"
"They want cash, not stock, for their coal."

"Did you point out to them the prospective value of the stock and the necessity of being all in one company to prevent price cutting and the opportunity to improve the community by opening up a new business?"

"I did. But we're not trying to improve the community; we're trying to make money for ourselves."

"I'm afraid, Warren, you were the wrong man to send after those options."

"I was," said Warren calmly. "I told you so at first. I'm not a clever talker."

"I don't want to tie up any more cash in this than I have to. How would it work to send John Dunneade after those options? We could make him attorney for us and the company and give him stock. What do you think?"

Warren took several minutes to consider this suggestion. "He can do it if any one can," he said at last. "He is very popular among the farmers. Everybody likes him. I like him, too, though he is always laughing at me."

"Eh? Why does he laugh at you?"
Hampden inquired.

"I don't know," answered Warren evenly. "I shall ask him sometime.
Shall I send for him?"

"Yes."

Warren opened the door and sent one of his clerks with the message. Then he sat down, staring thoughtfully at the smoke from Hampden's cigar.
Hampden took up a pen and pencil and began to make some calculations.

"He won't do it," Warren said suddenly.

"Why not?" Hampden looked up from his penning.

"He's honest."

"Aren't we honest?" Hampden demanded sharply.

"We're not sentimental," Warren answered calmly. "He is. We're trying to take advantage—legitimately, of course—of the farmers in a bargain."

"That's the thing he likes to fight."

"Not at all," Hampden contradicted coldly. "This is a straight business proposition, and I guess he'll not be sentimental when we offer him, say, ten thousand in stock. We can let him have that much without losing control."

"I don't think he'll take it," Warren insisted without warmth. "And he isn't a fool. He doesn't need money.
He's the sort that people take to, who ther he has it or not. I'm not like that.
I've got to have money to get people's respect. You're that kind too."

"Eh?" Hampden stared, half amused, half angered by Warren's matter of fact explanation. Warren was not in the habit of talking of himself. "Turn ed philosopher, have you? You'd better stick to banking, where you're at home."

A few minutes later John entered the bank. Hampden greeted him cordially.
Warren listened patiently while the other men used up a few minutes in pleasant preliminaries. They came at last to the purpose of John's summons.

"I suppose you've heard of our coal proposition?" Hampden suggested.

"Yes."

"There will be a good deal of legal work in connection with it."

In a few rapid, terse sentences Hampden outlined his plan of organization. Mindful of Warren's prediction and seeing John's face grow gravely dubious he endeavored to make his explanation quite matter of fact.

"Of course," he concluded, "you're familiar with the details. There is nothing new in the plan."

"We don't know much about high finance in New Chelsea. But I read the papers sometimes. It is almost a classic, I should say," John replied.

"Substantially the plan of all propositions," Hampden agreed.

"Let's see if I get you right. You take the options in your own name, agreeing to pay for the coal in stock of your company. Then you agree to turn the properties over to the company for a little more than twice this consideration, out of which you pay the farmers. This gives you control of the company that owns the coal and it insures to you a coal."

The money for development and marketing you lend the company. After a security of 1 percent of the coal is mined and sold, the balance is returned to you.

"I'm sorry, but I can't do it."

ing directly at Hampden. "That hardly gives the farmers a square deal, does it?"

The pupils of Hampden's eyes contracted suddenly. "Certainly it does."

he answered with some emphasis,
"since it converts properties that have been eating themselves up in taxes into a producing proposition, I didn't say," he added carelessly, "that your fee ought, in my opinion, to be about $10, 000—in stock."

"Worth how much?"

"Worth par," Hampden answered with a flourish. "Eventually."

"Phew! You haven't impressed me as a man who would pay city prices for country lumber, Mr. Hampden."

John replied thoughtfully. "Just why so much?"

"You will be expected to earn it," said Hampden dryly. "Are you in the habit of questioning fees because they are large?"

"I'm not in the habit of getting large fees. Only I'm not quite clear how you expect me to earn a fee of $10,000 in stock worth par eventually."

"The usual legal matters, charted organization, conveyances, and so on.
And, usually, helping us to sign up the Deer township properties."

"They don't like the proposition?"

"They're the only ones who haven't accepted it. They seem to be holding out under the advice of this fellow Cranshaw, is it?" Warren asked.

"We think you can swing them into line."

"I see," said John thoughtfully. His brow wrinkled in a troubled fashion as he gazed reflectively out at the clerks sweltering behind the cage. Hampden and Warren waited patiently but answer.

At last he raised his eyes to Hampden's. "I'm sorry, but I can't do it."

"Why not?" Hampden demanded.

"This fellow Cranshaw happens to be a good deal of a man. He and his neighbors are clients of mine in a small way and friends also. I think they do me the honor to trust me. I shouldn't care to advise them in this matter."

"Why not?" Hampden demanded
again.

"Let us say," John smiled, "that I am in politics and don't want to complicate my vote getting."

"That isn't your reason?"

"Well," John said regretfully, "if you will have it, it isn't a proposition that I can conscientiously recommend."
"You impeach my honesty?"

"I do not go so far, sir. Honesty is a matter of intent. I think I understand your point of view—that you will convert their life coal, as you say, into an income property and by starting a new industry will indirectly benefit the whole valley, which is probably true.
But the point is that the coal, the millions of tons in the situation is yours, and in return for it the shareholders must have control."

"The coal is always been the
We turn the initiative and control and the money to make it is us!"

"I see that, too. But don't you initiate this sort of business—overcapitalized?"

"Do you know of any capital in this valley better than this?"

"I do not," John confessed. "And it strikes me," he added gravely, "that you are taking advantage of that to go on." The word slipped and he corrected himself hastily. "The price is close bargain with the farmers."

Hampden abruptly straightened up in his chair. "You may stick to goings," he said. "Do I understand that you refuse the job?"

"I have been trying to explain my reasons."

"I'm not deeply concerned with your reasons," Hampden remarked shortly.
He picked up a document and pointed to it to peruse it. Observing that John did not at once take the hint, he looked up, smiling carelessly. "Good morning!"

John rose, flushed under the curt dismissal and went out of the bank.

"I told you so," Warren said.

"Can't you say anything more original than that?" Hampden exclaimed impatiently. Warren couldn't, so he held his peace.

"What I'd like to know," Hampden added reflectively, dropping the document, "is why Murchell let him be dominated. A young lawyer who refuses a big fee for sentimental reasons has no place in Murchell's machine.
He was talking to himself rather than to Warren."

But this was attacking what had a most attained the sameness of a tradition, an institution proudly cherished by New Chelsea. "Murchell is a smart man," Warren was moved to protest,
"and he likes Dunneade. And maybe John is smart enough to guess that the stock may be worth nothing—even finally."

Hampden looked at him sharply, but Warren's face was as expressionless
as that of the soldiers' monument.
"Well," the capitalist remarked philosophically, "it's Murchell's business, not mine."

That evening Katherine was to be found on the terrace. She was looking particularly well, a fact of which she was not altogether unconscious. But she was restless and wandered aimlessly into the library where she found her father busy at his desk on which lay a profusion of papers and blue prints. He nodded abstractedly.

"Still at work, dad? Don't you ever get tired of it?"

"I guess it's the only thing I know how to do. My generation was never taught to take pleasure seriously. You needn't complain, though." He leaned back in his chair and surveyed her approvingly. "Where are the awnings?"

She yawned. "There seems to have been a devastating epidemic. You will kindly proceed to amuse me."

"All this gorgeousness wasted?"

She yawned again. "I was rather looking for John Dunneade this evening."

"Hence that gown and that stunning new arrangement of the hair? You're not going to fall in love with an inco-

Two Waifs

Philanthropy Made Them Valued Citizens

By F. A. MITC

"You've got a mudder?"
"No."
"Fadder?"
"No."
"I haven't nelder."
This dialogue took place between two little street waifs, both selling newspapers, the names of which they shouted, the boy in a stentorian voice that could not have been expected to be contained in so small a body. He was about twelve and the other, a girl, nine. Both had been started out from their narrow abodes as soon as they were old enough to do anything to help their respective families as news agents; both lost their protectors and pursued the only method of keeping body and soul together they had learned.
"What your name?" asked the boy.
"Bet."
"Hain't you got a mudder anme?"
"Dunno."
"Didn't your fadder have a mudder name?"
"Hearn 'em callin' him Stus. What's your name?"
"I'm Jack-Jack Wright—I reckon that's what they called me fadder."
Jack and Bet met frequently on the same corner and when trade was dull would talk over their affairs. Neither had a home. Sometimes Jack would sleep on a bench in a park and occasionally when the night was chilly would steal into some stable and mount to the hay loft, where he would luxuri-ate in the soft, warm bed of hay. Being a provident child, he expended nothing for lodging in summer, knowing that he must save his money in order to sleep in the newsboys' home in winter. As for Bet, a washerwoman who had a room in a tenement house where she lived with three children, gave the child a lodging on some bed

"TO WANT MARRY JACK?" BEN ASKED OF BET

ding in a corner, which Bet paid for by minding her little ones while the mother delivered the laundry.
One morning when the two waifs met on the street corner where they sold papers Bet told Jack that she had lost her home. The woman with whom she had lodged had died and the children had been taken away.
Bet didn't know what to do for a place to sleep. Jack said he had made friends with a colored coachman, who let him sleep in a hayloft. Sometimes he would sleep down to the coach room and luxuriate on the cushions. He offered to see what he could do to extend the accommodations to Bet. Bet said she thought that would be fine.
That evening Jack took his little pal to the stable and asked Ben, the coachman, if she might sleep there.
Ben, who was an elderly man with a very kind heart, was inclined to grant the request.
"Ain't you children old enough to know what marryin' means?"
"Yes," replied Jack. "That means keepin' house together."
Ben shook his head. He brought his brain to bear on the subject, with the following result:
"Yo' hain't nothin' but children to be, but anyway I hain't gwine to let yo' in here without yo' get married."
"How we do that?" asked Jack.
"I reckon I kin marry yo'. I'm a palsen, I was palsen ob de old colored church in Richmond."
This meant nothing to the children except that Ben could marry them.
"Yo' want to marry de little gal?"
Ben asked of Jack.
"I don't keer."
"Yo' want to marry Jack?" Ben asked of Bet.
"Kin I sleep in the carriage ef I do?"
"Reckon I'll let yo'."
"Then I'll marry Jack, shure."
So Ben stood the pair up before him and married them according to the ritual of his old church, and after the ceremony he said to them:

"Now don't yo' shilly say nothin' bout dis to anybody. I done it because I want to let yo' sleep in de stable, and I don't want to let yo' be dis without yo' married."

Ben's tender conscience being satisfied the child-on shot in the stable and preferring the hayloft, Bet was with delight at stretching her little body on the back seat of a victoria.
Neither considered the ceremony that had united them of any importance except to gain Bet's permission for her to sleep in the stable.
After their marriage they were to gather even more than before. Jack seemed to feel that the word "marry" meant that he placed her under his protection and he was in duty bound to look after her. He taught the newsboys who tried to take her customers away from her and take possession of a stand that she claimed as her own.
So at last she enjoyed immunity from encroachment, especially when Jack was about, since he was called by the other gauds Bet's cop.

They were soon separated by Bet's being run over on the street and taken to a hospital. She recovered without any permanent injury, and one of the lady managers interested herself in her to secure her a home. A childless couple who had made inquiries for a girl about Bet's age, after some correspondence, sent for her, and Bet after a few years' residence with the foster parents was legally adopted. They were fairly well to do people, living on a farm, where they sold dairy products.

Jack was much distressed at his pal's accident and as soon as he heard of it went to the hospital where she lay to see her. He found some difficulty in gaining an entrance, being obliged to answer a number of questions as to his relationship.

"Are you her brother?" asked the matron.

"No."

"Any relation?"

"Yes, I'm her pal."

"Well, I don't think I could let you see her. You can't do her any good.
If you were her brother I wouldn't have the right to refuse you. But her pal doesn't mean anything."

Jack was disappointed. He was turning away when an idea struck him.

"Say, I'm her husband," he said.

"Her husband?" The lady smiled.

"Yes. We was married in a stable by a nigger."

The smile broadened.

"Can't I go in to see her?"

There was something so comical in the child's assertion and he looked so wistful that the matron relented, and Jack was admitted to see his wife.

It was not long after this that Jack,
who sold papers regularly to a philanthropist, was informed by his customer that there were farms worked by boys who had been taken up from the streets and if Jack liked to go to one of these farms the gentleman would see that he was permitted to do so.
Jack said he would like that "fully,"
and it was not long before, with money provided by his benefactor, he went to a farm, where he found a large number of boys, some older and some younger than himself. There he remained eight years, when, having accumulated a few hundred dollars, which he had saved from his share of the profits of the concern, he left the institution to make way for others younger than himself and started out to seek his fortune on his own account.

Meanwhile Bet had been sent to school and had grown up to be an intelligent young woman. She was courted by several suitors at different times, but she remembered her marriage in the stable, and, although she tried to discover whether it would be an impediment to her marrying as a grown woman, she could not satisfy herself in the matter. Her foster father inquired of several lawyers, whether she might legally marry and received different opinions. One said her marriage as a child was no marriage at all. Another said that if she married as a woman it would be better first to secure the annulment of the child marriage.

Bet didn't understand these opinions and because she didn't understand them she was all the more influenced by them. She didn't consider the way clear for her to marry any one. She had thus far met no one she wished to marry. Her foster father told her that when she did meet the man she desired it would be time enough to take steps in the matter of her child wedding.

But one day a young farmer came to the town where Bet lived and bought some agricultural implements. He secured an introduction to Bet and at once began a determined courtship.
Whether it was the zest he threw into it or that there was something about him to especially please her, she felt responsive to his suit. He was not long in proposing to her, and, since she was much inclined to accept him, instead of refusing she told him of the supposed legal detriment to her marrying. He listened with profound interest to her confession that she had been a street waif and the marriage incident of her childhood. When she had finished, looking at her with a singular impressiveness, he said:

"Bet?"

"Bet?"

"He told her how he had secured his education for a farmer, how he had got a little land and put that education into practice, how he had gone to the hospital where he had last seen her and had learned the name of his foster parents and where they lived.
Then under pretense of making purchases for his farm he had sought the peace and for he had considered a marriage with her of serious consequence, but determined it possible to win independently of it."

"This tells the story of your life,"

he said, "and I am glad to know it."

"I am glad to know it,"

he said, "and I am glad to know it."

he said, "and I am glad to know it."

Eggs a la Cupid

A Case Where Two Cooks Are Better Than One

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Just when and where and how Guy Hayes and Amy Wasson met does not appear. It might have been at a church social, or it might have been at the dancing class, or it might have been on the baseball grounds, for Guy was given to athletics, and Amy was an attendant upon the games. He this as it may, they were seen together often, so often that a rumor was started that they were engaged.

"Come in Saturday night," said Amy "and I'll make you something very nice."

"What is it?"

"A new dish."

"What kind of a dish?"

"You'll have to find that out when you come."

"Well, I'll be there, and I expect a treat for I hear you're a fine cook."

"Please cork the alcohol bottle and put it in the cupboard," said Amy Wasson as she lighted the burner under the copper chafing dish.

Guy Hayes obeyed and then returned to the table where Amy stood, an enchanting figure in a pale gray gown, with a wisp of a lace apron tied about her slender waist with rose tinted ribbons.

"Next?" he inquired, surveying the various dishes of ingredients for the mixture Amy was about to concoct.

There were a fat cake of cream cheese, a dozen eggs, a pitcher of cream, salt, paprika and a cake of butter.

"You may whisk the eggs presently—now, you may break six into this dish—and don't forget that you are to operate the coffee pot."

Guy surveyed the round table with doubtful eyes. On one side the chafing dish hissed; near by a copper kettle

"WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO MAKE TO NIGHT?"

boiled turbot, a small pot of alcohol, flame, and a tin can of French coffee put within reach of the young man.

"It's a new dish," said Amy, "and I expect you'll like it. I've never before eggs so delicately as I intend to treat the shells and the glowing fire at this time."

"It's better than a three ring circus, for you can have something over to eat then pick lemonade and peanuts," declared Amy as she dropped the cheese into the heated butter in the pan.

"What do you call it?" asked Guy, more because he wanted to hear her voice than because he cared what it was. Anything that Amy cooked was ambrosia to him.

"Eggs a la Cupid," answered Amy, bending above the sizzling mass in the pan. "Hess Deham gave me the recipe—and now, the cream, Guy. Thanks."

"Want the eggs beaten?" asked Guy.

"Yes, indeed, of course. I'm all ready for them, hurry."

Guy beat furiously and splattered eggs over his shirt front and on his coat sleeves. It mattered nothing. It was for Amy.

The charming cook added the eggs and hung breathlessly over the mixture. She added salt and paprika and stirred gently. It foamed and craved and grew smooth and delicious looking.

By the time Guy had tasted two pieces of bread the coffee was ready and the toast was ready for the eggs a la Cupid.

Just as the last drop of delicious mixture was poured on the last piece of toast the door opened and the maid ushered in another young man.

It was Henry Blair.

Henry was Guy's deadly rival for the hand of Amy Wasson.

Guy got up reluctantly and gnawed his lip when Amy gave cordial greeting to the newcomer.

"You are just in time to taste a new dish," she cried gayly. "Mr. Hayes and I have just concocted it."

Mr. Hayes greeted his rival with becoming solemnity and received a cold stare from Henry in return.

"Er—indeed? What do you call that?" he asked, with faint interest. He had preferred to be entertained in the drawing room, where he would be asked to sing, and when he sang then his voice and eyes could do deadly execution with Amy's heart. Who could be sentimental over a chafing dish and the odor of cooking food? He wrinkled his nose in disgust.

"Eggs a la Cupid," said Amy, offering him one of the plates. She had hastily set another place at the table.

"Ha!" said Henry and then stopped abruptly.

"Now, if Hayes hadn't been sitting there like a solemn owl Henry might have utilized that moment to have made some headway with Amy. Eggs a la Cupid was a phrase to conjure with. But he couldn't conjure with his rival glowering there.

Guy gave his plate to Amy and declined to taste the dish. He drank coffee and ate toast, but one of the eggs dish was left, and that which was spread on the pieces of toast was quite cold by this time or rather tough."

"I'm so disappointed in it," mourned Amy. "It ought to be light and fluffy."

"Tastes like one that Hattie Deham makes," observed Henry carelessly. "It was quite foamy though."

"She gave me the recipe," said Amy coldly.

"Ah, did you make it?" queried Henry, surprised. "I thought Hayes must have concocted it."

"Why?" asked Amy, with sparkling eyes.

"Oh, because it's sort of in his line, you know," murmured Henry, with a glance at Guy.

"Oh, no," said Guy coolly. "We manufacture some death at our plant—nothing of this sort."

"Pardon?" murmured Henry as he passed his cup for more coffee.

"Is it true that you are going to sing in vaudeville?" he asked Amy presently. There was a wicked light in his blue eyes.

Mr. Blair's eyebrows nearly disappeared in a fringe of blond hair.

"No sing in a vaudeville?" he demanded indignantly.

"I never dreamed of such a thing, believe me, Mr. Blair. Why do you ask?"

"Why, it's out of in your line, you know," said Amy sweetly, and Henry accepted the rebuke and ate the unpalatable remains of his meal in amiable silence.

Guy Hayes' hopes went up by leaps and bounds. Amy had arisen in the face of him. She had rebuked Henry Blair in his presence—she had done it for him.

Then the remainder of the evening, which Guy had expected to have enjoyed in a tete-a-tete with Amy, was spent in a general conversation.

After awhile they went into the drawing room, where Henry distinguished himself in his customary manner by singing love songs in a sweet baritone voice.

Guy could not sing a note.

Amy was fond of music.

Henry was a singer. He was the son of a rich man. He came of an old family, so old, in fact, that he appeared to think it was not necessary to be polite to his fellow men unless they could show a family tree of equal growth.

He went to the same private school that Guy Hayes had attended and it was he who had attached the nickname of "Son" to Guy, whose father was a manufacturer of canned delicacies.

Guy remembered all these things, and his exuberant mood changed to one of depression. Of course Amy had defended him because she was a girl, not for any personal interest in him.

He took his leave while Henry was still there. He thought Amy's fare well was cold.

After his departure Henry Blair entertained his hostess with many anecdotes about Guy Hayes. He told of their school days of the nickname of "Son," which still clung to Guy, and many other mean things that no one except a very small minded young man would have remembered or cared to repeat.

Amy listened, but did not smile. She appeared bored. Henry was not surprised. Who wanted to discuss a bore like Hayes when one could talk to Henry about his affairs?

Guy Hayes did not see Amy again for a fortnight. Occasionally he met Henry Blair, and that glided youth regarded him so coldly that Guy came to the conclusion that he had been put quite to rout by Miss Wasson.

In fact, that very night after Guy's departure Henry had proposed to Amy and had been refused.

Then one day Guy met Amy on the avenue.

"I was on my way up to see you," he said as he held her hand in his.

"Come this evening, and I will cook you some eggs on the chafing dish. You were cheated out of your share the other evening," said Amy kindly.

"Thank you. I'll come," promised Guy.

"Please cork the alcohol bottle and put it in the cupboard," said Amy that evening, and as Guy obeyed her he remembered that it was exactly what she had said, word for word, two for time, that other evening when Henry Blair had happened in and spoiled the occasion for Guy.

"What are you going to make to night?" he inquired as he returned to the table.

"Eggs a la Cupid, of course," said Amy, dropping in the cake of cream cheese.

Guy watched her in silence as she stirred. The deep dish that came into her cheeks was caused by something more than the heat from the chafing dish. Suddenly he passed around the table beside her and hid his hand over hers that held the spoon.

"Amy," he whispered, "doesn't that recipe say that two hands are better than one at stirring eggs a la Cupid?"

Amy didn't draw away. Indeed, her cheek neared his until they touched.

"If it doesn't read that way it ought to," she murmured.

GOOD FOR GRAFTERS.

Not the Political Kind, but the Men Who Cultivate Fruit Orchards.

Never use a straight edged grafting knife like those for sale in stores. Have one made of best steel with a curved edge and keep the edge ground sharp. The knife part should be about three inches long and the edge so curved that each end should make a clean cut in bark and wood about three-quarters of an inch ahead of the center of the knife. Many limbs are cross grained. A straight edged knife simply follows the grain, tearing the bark, or, rather, the bark will be split or torn straight down, while the wood is split off sideways, making a cleft in which no scion can go and have the two green bars together—so the graft will not live. A sharp curved edge cuts both sides of stub, bark and wood clear down, and the center of edge follows down, making a clean split cleft.

Always cut scion thicker on one side than the other, with a good live bud at the top of the cut on thickest edge. Set this thick edge always toward one side of stub. Force the cleft wide enough with the wedge on your graft.

ing knife so the scion will slip easily in until the bud at top of cut and on thick edge of scion is about half an inch below top of stub. Have live buds on one end of scion, and stub parallel. Then drive out grafting tool with a sharp rap on underside between knife edge and wedge. If scion is not been properly set and stub properly split the green inner bark of embryo layer on scion and stub will now be exactly matched and the cleft in stub will be pressing hardest on the green bark of thickest part of scion. The scion, when not being squeezed in, is enough to smash them, will be firmly held in place.

Now, with ball of wax in left hand work on small portion from back with thumb and first two fingers of right hand and begin at lowest end of one crack on stub, spread wax quickly with two or three motions up to top of stub, around scion, covering well the bud; then across the crack in stub around scion No. 2 and over lower bud and on down to end of crack on other side of stub. It was made right in end of process of waxing a stub and scion. The whole process can be done in a few seconds with two or three motions.—American Agriculturist.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Adds Healthful Qualities to the Food

Prof. Prescott, of the University of Michigan, testified before the Pure Food Committee of Congress, that the acid of grapes held highest rank as an article of food and he regarded the results from baking with cream of tartar baking powder as favorable to health.

Royal is the only Baking Powder made from Royal Grape Cream of Tartar.

Grange Column

Ironton Grange.

Ironton grange met Tuesday evening and was called to order by the worthy overseer.

Under the head of new business the election of officers was taken, up which resulted as follows:

Master, Frank J. Hammond; Overseer, Neil Kemp; Lecturer, John E. Knudsen; Steward, Ben Nowland; Assistant Steward, Matthew Sandness; Chaplain, Sylvia Lewis; Secretary, Emil Nasson; Treasurer, Ole Lyngklip; Gate Keeper, Neils Lyngklip; Ceres, Clara Nowland; Pomona, Edith Nowland; Flora, Sadie Hammond; Fire Insurance Director, Ben Nowland; Degree Team Captain, John Knudsen.

Lecturer's hour consisted of songs, stories and readings.

There will be a grange dance at the hall Friday evening, December 13. Committee on dance, Matthew Sandness, Darius Dean and F. Hammond. The grange will also have an Xmas tree Christmas eve; the church will be invited to take part with the grange. A committee was appointed to make arrangements.

Officers William Walker and Mortimer Orvis were granted permits to join Rock Elm grange.

Attendance, 32 members and one visitor.

Next meeting December 17.

Marion Center Grange.

Marion Center grange No. 956 met Wednesday evening, December 4, in regular town, in fourth degree. All officers were present. The usual order of business was transacted. The election of the following officers was the order of the session: Master—Nasson Burns; Overseer—Sam Straw; Lecturer—James Meggison; Chaplain—Edith Adams; Steward—William Poquette; Assistant Steward—Elmer Meggison; Secretary—Nasson Burns; Lady Assistant Steward—William Poquette; Treasurer—Harmon Himebauch; Insurance Agent—Frank Smith; Pomona—Florence Withers.

The Lecture Hour was observed by a song by Walter Black; Recitation, Walter McGilroy; Instrumental, Lida Black; Reading, Mrs. McGilroy. The new organ was installed during the week and is a nice instrument. It was bought from Eitan Jolliffe of Atwood. Grange closed in form with 36 members present and three visitors.

Just what you are looking for in useful articles for Christmas presents. Benj. Brown.—Adv. 501 against pardoning Swift. Every man should sign it and do all in his power to prevent the outrage that is likely to be done to the citizens of this county and inmates of the home. If Swift is pardoned, of what use are courts? This it came to the point where any crime can be committed and by the efforts of friends and the help of the governor, you will be pardoned or paroled.

COUNTY FARM

BUREAUS

Kent and Newaygo Counties Have Already Taken up the Work.

Plans are Being Rapidly Laid for Organization of Charlevoix County.

As we have previously noted the work of forming a farm bureau in this county, so we may take advantage of the financial assistance given by the government, and the crop improvement association is in the hands of County Clerk Payton and is being carefully planned. The following tells how the work is progressing in other sections.

The Fremont board of trade under the leadership of its president, Joseph Gerber, has started a campaign directed toward the securing of a farm management agent for Newaygo county. The work of the county agent was recently explained to the board by M. J. Thompson, district supervisor, who represents the federal department of agriculture in the lake shore counties from Muskegon to Traverse City. The cost of a county agent was estimated at $2,000 to $3,000 a year. It was pointed out that from $1,000 to $1,200 could be secured annually from the department of agriculture at Washington, and $500 a year for two years from the Crop Improvement association of Chicago, leaving not more than $1,600 to be raised by local organizations. Each of the Fremont banks immediately pledged $100 toward the starting of the work and also the Fremont Canning factory. President Gerber pledged $50. It is believed with a start of $350, the necessary funds can be quickly secured.

At the present time there are three federal agents at work in the Western Michigan territory. M. J. Thompson with the shore counties and Charles E. Reed with the counties back from the shore, are maintained entirely by the federal government. J. H. Skinner who gives his entire time to Kent county, is maintained by funds furnished by the federal government, the Grand Rapids association of commerce and the Kent county board of supervisors. The appointment of an agent for Newaygo county, will mean that four men will give their entire time to the promotion of agriculture in Western Michigan and that this region will advance agriculturally as it never has before.

Broke his Leg.

Joseph McKelroy, who lives south of Charlevoix and is well known in this city, has the misfortune last Saturday to break his leg above the ankle. Mr. McKelroy was skidding logs in the swamp near his home, when in some manner a log slipped and swung against another, catching him between the two and breaking of the bones of his leg.

(Sophia Berg)

Miss Mahyn Chille was absent Monday on account of illness.

We have finished our work in primary methods and are about to take up some hand work in manual training before Christmas vacation. Word was received from Miss Hazel Holliday, class of '09, who is teaching near Central Lake. She is principal of a two room school in which Miss Grace Pickard, of Belaire, has charge of the primary grades.

The study of parliamentary law and current events was started last Wednesday.

Miss Florence Alexander and Miss Lois Frazier visited the normal room one day last week, also Miss Ella Lindholm of Bay Shore.

Misses Mahyn Chille and Agnes Worth were housekeepers last week, the latter in charge of the ventilation. Misses Hazel Mills and Hazel Gilmarin were editors.

KETCHAM IS ELECTED

Hastings Man is Chosen Master of Michigan State Grange.

AT MEETING HELD LAST WEEK

Over a Thousand Were in Attendance at Last Week's Meeting.

Resolutions are Adopted on a Great Number of Subjects—Flint Secures the Meeting for Next Year.

Last week the Soo was the Mecca for all members of the Grange as the order held its annual session in that city. Monday night the trains were crowded with enthusiastic farmers between eight and nine hundred crossing the straits Monday night.

In all the forty years of its existence the Grange has never been entertained in finer shape than they were by the Upper Peninsula city. Several miles out members of the reception committee boarded the train and by the time the city was reached a place to stay had been assigned to everybody.

The display made by Chippewa county of Upper Peninsula farm products was one of the finest ever shown anywhere in the state. In connection the Chippewa County Poultry association had their annual exhibition, all of which was thrown open to the visitors. A parade of Chippewa county horses was a novel feature of the entertainment provided for the visitors.

The chief feature of the meeting centered around the election of officers, which developed into a warm contest.

John C. Ketcham of Hastings, was elected Master over Herbert F. Baker and C. S. Bartlett. The other officers elected are:

Overseer, Frank N. Nis, Minden City.

Lecturer, Jennie Buell, Ann Arbor. Steward, T. E. Niles, Mancelona. Chaplain, Mrs. O. J. C. Woodman, Paw Paw.

Treasurer, Frank Coward, Bronson.

Secretary, J. W. Hutchins, Hamover.

Executive Committee, George B. Horton, Fruit Ridge; W. F. Taylor, Shelby; Jerry Lawson, Sault Ste. Marie; C. S. Bartlett, Pontiac; T. H. McNaughton, Ada.

Flint was chosen as the place of meeting for next year.

The United States government redoubled its efforts to bring about universal peace instead of paying marked attention to the construction of additional battleships; that the grange stand solidly behind the pending Paige-Wilson agricultural bill; that the Aldrich scheme of banking and regulating currency would work out to the decided disadvantage of the nation at large; that lotteries, the buying or selling for sale of stock, bonds, fake merchandise and all other such forms of gambling, should be for all time prohibited; that no mail matter save that used by the president, postmaster-general and postmaster of the United States for official business be franked; that railroads be forced to pay the shipper demurrage for each day the latter is forced to wait to secure a car or cars for legitimate shipments after he has properly notified representatives of such road or roads; that the president and vice-president of the United States be elected by direct vote of the people instead of the electoral college; that provision be made by law compelling more attention to the teaching of agriculture in the public schools and colleges, and that parcels of land be furnished each such institution for experimental agricultural purposes were some of the resolutions to receive endorsement.

The convention also went on record as opposing the proposed separation of state and local taxes and the repeal of the present mortgage law. The delegates, did, however, favor the enactment of legislation, taxing all automobiles at the rate of fifty cents per horse power, such fund to be returned to the county from which it is derived to be apportioned on road improvement work in that locality.

Those attending from this county were: John A. Newville, Martin Ruhling and wife, Earl Clark and wife, William Withers, Elmer Ingalls and Glenn M. Dullais.

Former's Residents Loss.

Word has been received that C. L. Otto, formerly of this city, who went to Cressline, Ohio, about a year ago, had the misfortune to lose his mill, together with considerable stock on hand recently from an unknown cause.

The total loss is thought to be about $12,000 with insurance covering about half that amount.

DIED SUDDENLY.

Ironton Man Drops Dead Thursday at Brutus While Shaving.

Peter Prevost of Ironton, who went to Brutus about three months ago to work in a blacksmith shop, dropped dead while shaving last Thursday morning.

He was fifty-eight years of age and highly respected wherever he was known.

He leaves a daughter, mother, two brothers and a sister.

The body was brought to this city Saturday by his brother Joseph, and nephew Will Prevost. The funeral was held from the Methodist church.

Received Fatal Injuries.

Dr. L. B. Bartlett received a telegram Tuesday morning from Ash-tabula, Ohio, which contained the sad news that his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Mahet Bartlett, wife of the doctor's son, F. C. Bartlett, had been killed, and his daughter, Mrs. A. Stewart and little grand-daughter, Danline, daughter of Mrs. Bartlett, had been injured in a street car accident in that city.

All the injured are well known in this city, having been guests at the Bartlett home. The doctor left on the afternoon train for Ash-tabula.

Found.

WILL SHOW AT PITTSBURG

Western Michigan Apples and Potatoes Will be Exhibited There.

Western Michigan Development Bureau Will Make a Fine Display in the East.

The Western Michigan Development Bureau is planning an apple show for Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the middle of January. Banks of apples and potatoes similar to the banks which attracted so much attention at the Grand Rapids and Detroit apple shows will be erected in a store building in the business center of Pittsburgh, and the general public will be invited to call and see what Western Michigan has to show in the way of farm products. The apple bank will contain not less than 100 bushel boxes of as fine apples as have ever been produced and the potato bank will have not less than fifty boxes of fancy Michigan potatoes. In connection with the apples and potatoes, will be shown fruit in glass jars and a display of photographs of Western Michigan farm and orchard scenes. The illustrated lecture, "Western Michigan, the Land of Fruit and Fortune" will be given each afternoon and evening during the week of the display. Apples and potatoes for this exhibit have already been secured and are in cold storage awaiting the attention of experts who will arrange them for the exhibit.

As there has been great interest among the people of Pittsburgh during the last few years in the country to the west of them, it is believed that a large number of people can be induced to investigate the Western Michigan proposition and that a reasonable number will eventually decide to locate with us.

COTTER HAS RESIGNED

General Manager of Pere Marquette Quits on Account of his Wife's Illness.

William Cotter, general manager of the Pere Marquette, has resigned to take effect January 1.

Mr. Cotter is said to be leaving the road with the entire good will of the receivers, because of the serious illness of his wife. He will take her at once to Houston, Texas, and give her his undivided attention.

Mr. Cotter has been general manager of the Pere Marquette eight years October 1 last, coming to the position from the Missouri Pacific, where he held the position of manager. Previous to that he was in charge of the Grand Trunk lines west of the Detroit and St. Clair rivers.

Frank H. Alfred, assistant general manager, is acting general manager pending the selection of a permanent successor to Mr. Cotter.

DEATH OF AN OLD RESIDENT

Clifford Papineau Had Lived in This City for Over Forty Years.

Leaves a Widow and Three Children—Funeral Was Held Monday.

Clifford Papineau was born February 26, 1860 at Harbor Springs, Michigan. He has lived in this city for the last 41 years. He was married April 2, 1883 to Flora McMillan of Echo, Michigan. To this union was born four children, two daughters, Grace and Nenerva Helen, (who died at the age of four years and five months) and two sons, George and John.

Mr. Papineau has followed the occupation of marine engineer.

A year and a half ago he received an appointment as engineer on the government Light Ship No. 89 at Martin's Reef. He remained there until the first of last June when his health failed and he came home where he remained until the time of his death, last Friday morning. He was a kind husband and a loving father.

Besides his widow and three children, two sisters and two brothers are left to mourn his death.

The funeral service was held on Monday afternoon at the Baptist church, Rev. B. Atchison officiating.

HOW TO SEND XMAS PARCELS

Postmaster General Hitchcock Gives Out Set of Rules.

Care Must be Taken to Insure Their Delivery—Senders Make Many Mistakes.

A set of rules for the guidance of persons sending Christmas gifts by mail has been promulgated by Postmaster General Hitchcock. These are the things to learn and remember:

Postage on all matter should be fully prepaid. Packages not fully prepaid will be held for postage.

All packages should be fully and plainly addressed, including street and number, or number of rural route in order that there may be no delay in handling and delivering them.

The sender's name and address should be placed in the upper left-hand corner of the envelope or wrapped to insure return of mail if not delivered.

All matter should be securely packed and wrapped so as to bear transmission without breaking. Matter other than that of the first-class must be so wrapped that the contents of the package may be examined easily by postal officials. When not so wrapped the matter will be charged with postage at the first class rates.

Packages of third and fourth class matter may bear, in addition to the names and addresses of the senders and addressees, a written designation of the contents—a simple inscription not in the nature of personal correspondence, the words "Merry Christmas," "Happy New Year," "With Best Wishes" and "Do No Open Until Christmas," or words to that effect.

All valuable letters and parcels should be registered. The special delivery of mail by messenger may be obtained by placing on any letter or package a special delivery stamp or ten cents in ordinary stamps in addition to the amount of the required postage. When ordinary stamps are used the words "Special Delivery" must be placed directly under, not on the stamps.

Through carelessness in preparing merchandise for mailing during the holidays last year, Mr. Hitchcock states that more than 37,000 parcels intended for Christmas or New Year's gift were sent to the division of dead letters. Of this number 8,000 were for delivery in foreign countries, being held unavailable because the senders neglected to place their addresses on the wrappers or to fix the requisite customs declarations, as required by the several parcels post conventions. Nearly 10,000 parcels were mailed with insufficient stamps affixed.

In addition to the described unavailable matter, more than 15,000 valuable articles were found loose in the Christmas and New Year's mail of last year as a result of having escaped from their wrappers through negligent or improper packing by the senders.

ON SERIOUS CHARGE

Mr. and Mrs. Ad. Beers of Boyne Valley Arrested Last Thursday.

Mr. and Mrs. Ad. Beers of Boyne Valley township were arrested Thursday pending the examination, which is set for next Thursday, the couple are being held for taking unlawful liberties with Lela Louise Barnes, a stepdaughter of Beers, now sixteen years old, and but fourteen at the time of the alleged crime.

The charge against Beers will probably be incest, while Mrs. Beers will be charged with being an aider and abettor.

Lela is the complaining witness. With her child she is at present living with her uncle, John Chicknor, Evangevine township.

Potato Growers.

The Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, has quarantined the United States against potatoes from England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Newfoundland, because the potato canker is prevalent in these countries. That means that the American potato growers will have to raise 10,000,000 bushels more than they did last year. The Dominion of Canada is also using extreme caution concerning potato canker and has issued notice that concealment of the outbreak of this disease in Canada is severely punishable by law. We bring this to the attention of Michigan producers and urge them to get in touch with the State Agriculture College and United States Department of Agriculture concerning the subject of potato canker.

SWIFT'S PAROLE IS EXTENDED

Result of the Hearing Held in Lansing Last Friday.

SIXTY DAYS MORE EXTENSION

Matter is Now Put Up to Governor-Elect Ferris.

Several Hundred Charlevoix Citizens Protest Against Further Leniency Being Shown.

Governor Osborn, at the conclusion of the hearing held in the executive chambers Friday, granted H. L. Swift, the convicted superintendent of Beulah Home, an extension of sixty days parole. The reason given for extending the parole was to enable Swift's attorneys to have submitted to the circuit court a new phase in the case in the shape of a postal card, alleged to have been written by Merl Griffin, a former charge of the institution, upon whose evidence Swift was convicted. Twenty-five close friends of Swift were present at the hearing among them William H. Hill of Detroit, former progressive candidate for congress.

Several boys, former inmates of the Beulah home, were brought in to testify as to the evidence of the postal card alleged to have been written by Griffin in which the card stated that the writer was sorry that he had testified as he had, and that he knew Swift was not guilty. When the Griffin boy was placed on the stand, he denied absolutely any knowledge of having written the card, and James Leys, another lad of 15 years, was brought in and testified that the Griffin boy had written the card in his presence and that Griffin had given him the card to mail to Swift.

This so the Leys boy claimed, occurred in Grand Rapids, about a year ago. Other boys were brought in to testify as to whether they knew the Griffin lad, included among the list being Donald Graham.

Griffin denied that he had ever seen the Graham boy before and stuck to his story throughout that he had never written the card.

Attorney Travis of Grand Rapids, who defended Swift in his two trials, made a strong plea for some action on the part of the governor, declaring that Swift was the victim of persecution and was not guilty of the crime for which a jury had found him guilty. Attorney General Wykes also took part in the proceedings. Prosecuting Attorney D. H. Fitch, brought about a sudden termination of the hearing when he informed the governor that the circuit judge who had sentenced Swift had expressed a willingness to have any new evidence admitted that would tend to clear up the situation.

This was the exact point which the governor had been trying to bring out during the hearing, and when he was so informed, he immediately adjourned the hearing. (Continued on page 6.)

Mrs. Edith Meggison and son Frank, and Walter Black attended the Gleaners at Boyne Falls last Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. O. R. Beattie, and son Wesley, spent Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dodd and family. It was the birthday of O. R. Beattie and Anna Violet M. Dodd. It was her first birthday and the usual birthday cake was present. A candle burned throughout the dinner hour.

The Busy Woman's Day.

It begins early, ends late, and is full of work. She often has kidney trouble without knowing it. Her back aches, and she is tired and worn out. Sleeps poorly, is nervous, has no appetite. Her bladder gives her trouble too. Foley Kidney Pills will cure all that and make her strong and well. They are the best medicine made for kidney and bladder disorders. THIS IS CERTAIN

The Proof That Charlevoix Readers Cannot Deny.

What could furnish stronger evidence of the efficiency of any remedy than the test of time. Thousands of people testify that Doan's Kidney Pills have brought lasting results.

Grateful endorsements should prove undoubtedly the merits of this remedy. Years ago people right in this locality testified to the relief they had derived from the use of Doan's Kidney Pills. They now confirm their testimonials. They say that time has completed the test.

M. Betchel, assistant superintendent of Metropolitan Life Insurance company, 319 Madison avenue, Petoskey, Michigan, says: "The public statement given by me in favor of Doan's Kidney Pills while living in Niles, still holds good. For nearly three years I was caused great suffering from a constant ache across my loins and kidneys. I sat for while it was almost impossible for me to straighten. I was in bad shape when I began using Doan's Kidney Pills. One box completely relieved me, although other remedies failed. I had a recurrence of the trouble some time later, but I again took Doan's Kidney Pills, and they removed the attack."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-McMunn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

WILSON

Christmas will soon be here. Mark Collins is working in Boyne City.

Miss Gladys Hudkins spent Saturday and Sunday at home.

Clifford Brown of Brickerville was in the neighborhood Sunday.

Roy Bancroft visited at the home of E. S. Brumhall the first part of the week.

Miss Eunice Warden has gone to Grand Rapids, where her sister, Otis, is to work.

Florence Shepard, who is attending high school at East Jordan, spent Sunday at home.

They Always Help Elderly People.

Foley Kidney Pills give just the help elderly people need to tone and strengthen their kidneys and bladder and regulate their action. John McHesters, Stratton, Ill., says: "I feel better and stronger than I have for many years, and Foley Kidney Pills did it." Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

COUNTY NORMAL.

(Dessie Groenink)

Miss Bessie Tillotson, of Bay Shore, visited the Normal room one day last week.

Miss Himes is reading "Dickens' Christmas Carol" to the class as part of the opening exercises in the morning.

The class has been doing some interesting work, under the instructions of Miss Whiting, making addresses and cover clipping booklets for Christmas presents.

The normal class attended the poultry show that was held in the Wilbur building, and was very much interested in the different fowls on exhibition and also the method of caring for them.

Miss Hazel Gilmartin and Miss Hazel Mills began their practice teaching last week in fourth-grade geography, and Miss Dessie Groenink is teaching the choral class reading.

Miss Nabel Duntap and Miss Mabyn Hille were appointed home-keepers this week, the latter in charge of the ventilation. Miss Hazel Mills and Mr. George Hawkins are editors.

Dr. Wm. Sadler, author of "The Cause and Cure of Colds," says that common colds should be taken seriously, especially when they "hang on." Foley's Honey and Tar Compound is a reliable household medicine for coughs and colds, equally effective for children and for grown persons. Take it when you feel a cold coming on. It will avert danger of serious results, and cure quickly. No harmful drugs. Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

C. H. S. NOTES.

Bessie Allen was absent Thursday and Friday on account of illness.

It is not probable that the H. S. will have a basketball team this year.

The chemistry class now has an electric furnace which will greatly aid in the work on electricity.

Lawrence Dutton has entered the H. S. and joined the freshman class. He attended school at Nanawate this fall.

The visitors for the week were: Mr. Milford, Mr. Bashaw, Ethyl Shapton, Lottie Cohen, Floyd Webster and James Gaskin.

The German I class has taken up the study of "Jung Deutschland," a book that has never been used in the school here before.

Vacation someone says. Yes, vacation! The time to which everyone looks with pleasure. For days or even weeks the students have been looking forward to that time when they may with gladness lay aside their daily routine of school duties. Vacation is met with fond greeting and students and teachers enjoy the time of their lives.

"Harrah! for the Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to everyone."

Coughing at Night.

One bad cough can keep the whole family awake at night. Phil. Disorineau, Seltzer, Mich., says: "I could not sleep on account of a bad cough, and I was very weak, I used Foley's Honey and Tar Compound and soon the cough left and I slept soundly all night." Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

ODD SUPERSTITIONS ABOUT CHRISTMAS.

There are superstitious ancient Christmas in all countries, but probably the following are a few of the most extraordinary:

In north Germany a person must not spit during the twelve nights of Christmas, lest he or she should walk after death, nor after sunset on Saturday, for then mice will eat the wife. If it is desired to have money and luck all the year round one must not fall to eat herrings on New Year's day, nor if you wish to be lucky must you rock an empty cradle or spill salt wantonly or cross knives or point at the stars.

If a dirty cloth is left on the table over Christmas night it will make the angels weep, if you point upward to the rainbow it will make the angels feet bleed, and if you talk of cabbage while looking at the moon you will hurt the feelings of the man in it.

At Kilgubbin, near Blackpool, in England a very common superstition prevails that the bells of a hidden church may be heard by any one who bends his ear to the ground. In Berkshire it was at one time a popular belief that bells could be heard ringing in the ground on Christmas eve, and in some parts of England miners have been heard to say that bells could be heard hourly pealing in the most distant parts of the mine.

The most popular superstition in many parts of England is that every remnant of Christmas decoration must be removed before Candlemas day. Should a sprig of holly or other evergreen be left in any house one of its occupants will die within the year.

America's Oldest Christmas Bells

The oldest chime of bells to this country is located in old Christ church, on Second street, Philadelphia. They have been pealing out the glad tidings of "Peace on earth, good will toward men," for considerably over a hundred years and will do so this year at Christmas time.

HIS RISE TO POWER

By Henry Russell Miller.

CHAPTER XXV—Continued.

Inside, the decorators—not from New Chelsea—were putting the finishing touches on the last room, and most of the furnishings were in place. He found that the globe had done the house grave justice. It was not at all "palatial," but planned with an eye to comfort and harmony—"livable-ness," Katherine called it—and marked by extreme simplicity—of the expressive sort however.

Under Katherine's guidance John was shown the whole house from garden to cellar. At least half of his admiration he gave to his guide. He had never before known her as she was that afternoon, girlish, enthusiastic, absorbed in her woman's task of homemaking, never so alluring. Afterward they rested on the shady eastern porch.

"Do you know," she said, "you haven't exclaimed once. Not a single "Fine" or even a "Tully." You're a very satisfactory person—in some ways. Do you like it?"

"Very much," he answered with such evident sincerity that she was content
"but why this air of permanence?"

"Because this is to be home. Of course we shall be in the Steel city during the winter, with a month in New York for the opera. But this is home.
It seems home—and out of the way
now. I suppose, but that won't last long. The Sangers have bought the place next to this. The Elks are maybe the Hawes, are coming. Well, soon have our own little colony."

"And the siege of New York?"

"A foolish expedition from which re-have directly retreated. Her laugh did not ring quite so free as usual.
She continued: "It was humiliating leading to people who despise you for your presumption. The crimson rushed resentfully to her cheeks. He said nothing.

"Thank you for not asking questions. It's foolish for me to be so sensitive about it, but"—she shrugged her shoulders—"my experience wasn't pleasant. I like the new life. I like to meet men who are doing things—who are making their own conquests, who living on the fruits of others' conquests."

He sat silent. To win, always to win, was the sum of this girl's philosophy, with no thought of its cruelty or realization that for every victor there must be many losers. And wealth power, the things a man had, were the badge of his victory.

She was laughing at him. "What do you think when you retire into yourself so rudely? Anything profitable or interesting?"

"I'm afraid not. Do you think winning is all of life?"

"Yes, it is." "There is the use of strength, if one is strong, to support the weak."—He paused abruptly, conscious of the truthfulness and fullness of his words, with the shyness of the man who, self-conscious without conceit, fears to uncover his ideals before unsympathetic eyes.

"Oh, John Dunmeade," she replied impatiently, "you're so disappointing, with your schoolboy platitudes."

He made no answer; the quick red flushed to his face. And why should she interest herself in his ideas? A long, troubled silence fell between them.

"John," she said suddenly, "was it necessary for you to criticize and quarrel with my father?"

"I did not criticize him," he responded quickly, "and there is no quarrel that I am aware of. We merely differed in opinion on a business matter, each believing he was right."

"Will you tell me why you think him wrong?"

He found his lips sealed. "I haven't criticized him," he said gravely, "and I can't begin now, especially to his daughter."

The afternoon was spoiled. Into her face had come a look almost of hardness, like the swift shadow of a cloud over the fields on a sunny day, the absence of which had given her the sweet, frank girliness. What had he to do with this girl to whom luxury was a matter of course? Why did her impatience with his ideals trouble him?

"Let us go home," she said.
They went to the horses. From the beginning Crusader behaved badly.
"Be careful!" he cautioned her, as they turned into the public road.
"That horse wants to bolt."
"I told you he lacks common sense sometimes," she laughed.
As though to illustrate this saying Crusader now began a series of short, cramped plunges, rearing and tossing violently to loosen the steel thing that cut into his mouth.
She brought her crop stingingly down on the horse's neck. Crusader broke her grip on the reins, took the bit between his teeth and, head lowered, raced madly down the hill.
John did not stop to consider the uselessness of risking his own life too.

His arm rose and fell continuously as he tried to beat more speed into his horse to close the rapidly widening gap between him and the flying Crusader.

A turn of the road took her out of his sight. Thereafter to the end of the chase she was always just beyond the next turn. He was not a good rider, and the wonder was that as he swung at top speed around the curves in the snaky road he was not unseated.
Lightning's legs doubled and stretched with a rapidity never before and never again attained in his phlegm life; but to John the space between the pounding staccato hoof beats seemed endless.
The blood thrilled heavily in his temples, at every turn he closed his eyes, fearing to see a still, broken figure laying him. Yet to him just then life meant to find—what he must find.

By a miracle the descent was accomplished without mishap. The road ran on a level for a few hundred yards, then began a long gradual climb of the next hill. Lightning's steps lagged.
At a turn in the road just below the crest he came upon the panting Crusader standing with head weakly lowered. Seated on the roadside was Katherine, crouching up her hair.

Lightning stopped at his own accord.
John's blood rushed to his heart, leaving his face very white.

He climbed weakly from the saddle and threw himself down beside her.
"It was glorious while it lasted," she said.

"Glorious?" he stammered.

"Oh, I was frightened too." She held out a hand. It was shaking like an angry leaf from which the sap has begun to recede. "But you look worse seated than I do. What did you think while it was happening?"

He stared at her in a queer, dazed fashion. "I—I am trying to think what I was thinking."

But he knew—he knew!
She looked at him curiously, and then she, too, knew. The knowledge did not displease her. She rose suddenly.

As he was having her at her home
she said impulsively: "John, I'm sorry
I was so nasty about your misadventure standing with father. Won't you tell me what it is about his business you dislike? Perhaps if I had your point of view."

But he shook his head.

CHAPTER VI The Call.

IF Consolidated Coal company —was a fact, a splendid, epoch-making fact.

The last stubborn holdout, surrendering to Hamden's skillful negotiations, to necessity and pressure of public opinion, had been led triumphantly into camp and on Hamden's terms. Among the hills west of town things began to happen under his forceful direction. A spur from the railroad was being constructed. A village of rough shanties was hastily thrown together to house the colony of miners that was to be brought later. An atmosphere of businesslike haste pervaded New Chelsea. The price of real estate promptly advanced. Visions of expansion, of prosperity, filled the eye.

Cranshaw one day explained to John why he and his deer township neighbors had capitulated.

"We got to take what we can get. It takes a lot of money to develop coal lands. Hamden has it—and we haven't.
We found he'd got all the right o'- ways. If we could find any one to buy our coal, he couldn't 'a' shipped, 'cept'n' over Hamden's right o' way. I don't like to be held up, but it's my only chance to leave anything for my children."

"I hope it will all turn out for the best," said John, feeling—he hardly knew why—that it might not so turn out.

"Seems like," said Cranshaw, "the feller with money has the whip hand over the feller with something to sell or develop. Trouble is, even when we know it's wrong, we don't want to change it, hoping that some day it'll give us a chance to make money the same way."

"Oh, no!" John protested. "I'd hate to believe that. I can't believe it.
Men aren't all of the dog-eat-dog species."

"Well," said "M. a little ashamed,"
"I don't know as I believe it myself.
Guess I'm a little peevish over being outbargained by Steve Hamden. I wish," he added thoughtfully, "you could be lawyer for the company. It looks like as farmers won't have much say in the business. I'd like to have some one on the inside who could tell us what's gonn' on."

"No chance of that," "M. Hamden doesn't think much of me." He did not tell Cranshaw why he had lost the captain's favor.

The net result of his quixotism, he thought with some bitterness, was to win Hamden's hostility and to put himself out of the way of protecting his former friends.

And late in October occurred his party's rally.

It was necessary to marshal the badly shaken party host. For into Benion county had marched a young man who, in a single opposition speech, broke through the defenses so painstakingly reared by Jeremy Appleton and his fellow soldiers. None other than Jerry Brent. A big, ruddy, well-boned fellow, smooth in manner and sometimes in grammar, but with a crude, passionate eloquence that always carried his audience with him.

He had been a coal miner, a labor organizer, and had, after a struggle so common that description shies been admitted to the practice of law, in all the thirty-five years of his life the charge of material dishonesty had never been raised against him; he was still poor, and he was counted a rising star in the opposition party, not with the confidence of his party bosses, however. They considered him a radical, unsafe and—cardinal crime in an honest and unmanageable young man—undisciplined. Respectable people sneered at his "antics." It was said that his eyes were fixed on the next nomination for governor. Even with this suspicion rankling in their minds the tenses dared not—so popular was he among labor men—refuse him, opportunity to speak during the campaign.

John, an inconspicuous listener, heard Brent's Benion county speech it troubled him. It seemed to him unanswerable. Brent, it was true, dealt in terms of suspicion, not of facts, but it was a suspicion that found a swift echo in the hearts of his audience. He frankly said as much.

"We don't govern this state," said Brent. "One man, Murchell, picks out our officers and tells 'em what to do while in office. You people don't govern Benion county. One man, Jim Sheehan, Murchell's tool, chooses your commissioners, your treasurers, your sheriffs, your district attorneys." John winced. "And it's wrong, my God! It's wrong!" the orator cried passionately.

"I would be wrong, even if these men were honest. And I blame you for it. You haven't the right to shove your responsibility on other men's shoulders, and they haven't the right to take the power."

The orator's hot, rough eloquence found a lodgment where least expected in John's heart, already sensitized by his own discoveries and questionings.
Jerry Brent was right.

The oldest inhabitant could not remember when the old party had been so vigorously attacked. To stem the tide of revolt—John felt it strongly in his canvass—an old time rally was to be held in the square. Sheehan instructed John as to the part which the latter was to play.

"You're to speak. Hit 'em up hard.
Tell 'em all about us ben' the friend of the farmer. It's your chance. Parrott and Sheehan'll be there. Parrott's no slouch a speaker, but you can beat him. Farmers like a good speech."

"I don't know that I care to make the speech."

"Don't you want to be elected?"
Sheehan demanded.

"I guess so. Yes," with sudden vigor and a short laugh that Sheehan did not understand "I do."

"Well, then, nlay up your independence. Tell 'em there's no strings tied to you."

"I can tell them that—with truth."
Sheehan looked long and hard at him. Then he chuckled. "Of course And don't forget the state ticket when you're inkin'."

When he was alone John fairly writhed in his self-contempt and hatred of the boss.

He prepared a fine speech, and then came the night of the rally—the pomp and panoply of war.

They stood with John under the big elm at the northwest corner of the square, where Main and North streets met. Before us is the rough board speakers' stand, hastily knocked together and liberally bedecked with flags and lithographs of Lincoln and of Beck, the candidate for treasurer. In front are many rows of pine benches over all falls the white splendor of the full October moon, to be dimmed when the four kerosene torches guarding the speakers' stand are set flaring and smoking, and by many other lights.

Debouching into Main street from other roads comes a steady stream of alecks, gamut and strong and slow moving as the human freight they draw, shying awkwardly at the light-flashed in their eyes by reckless, mischievous toys. The alecks are satily hitched in various churchyards, and the drivers gather in the square in shuffling, serious groups. Gradually the square fills. A hoarse hum of voices rises. The air becomes charged with an unnatural excitement—the sense of an occasion—bred of the strange light-and hostile and the presence of many men. John between bands strikes his time to feet. His agonized soul, jittered by much questioning, leaps forth.

CHRISTMAS THROUGH THE YEAR

Copyright, 1912, by American Press Association.

THE night is still,
Save for the clinking of the frozen snow,
As a lone wagon coming from the town,
Laden with produce and a host of toys,
Wends its way slowly o'er the silent hill.
The moon is creeping from behind the trees
That skirt the pond and make a border wide
And beautiful and strong about its edge
As through the fluttering branches of the fir
That hang in garlands, spangled with their cones,
Its shimmering beams in streams as of a web
Spun by a spider, spread them to the west.
And lighter, lighter ever grows the night,
And ever brighter grows that plain of white,
Scarce broken in its high piled, ample drifts.
Now and again from out some gabled roof
A chimney points its capping toward the skies
And soft gray smoke in mystic circlets pours,
Soon to be lost in the evasive night.

Snug in his wagon, drowsy with the spell
Of the unusual stillness of the night,
Wrapped in his furs and wearing heavy gloves,
A young man drives old Dobbin with loose rein.
He enters, ere the clock strikes twelve, the gate
Of the paternal homestead, there to stay,
Close by the fireside, till the dawn of day,
When, at the first flush of the rising sun,
He will assume the role of Santa Claus.

The morning breaks—the first sound in the house
A baby's prattle and her wild delight
When, going to the fireside where had hung
The night before five empty stockings, lo,
Groaning with good things, burdened with their toys
Full to overflowing with the Christmas joys!
Then wild delights! John, Mary, Tom and Lou,
Just from their beds, come hurrying to see What good St. Nick had left them ere he passed Up through the chimney to his ample sleigh
And his six reindeers hurried him away.
Across the housetops, burdened with their snow,
To other hearthstones whence he had to go.

Brighter the day grows. Richer are the joys
For the adults, who watch the children romp,
While merriment and laughter, peal on peal,
Ring through the house and gladness unconfeined
Proclaims the presence of the Christmas day.
When glad good will and peace possess the mind
And man to man, his brother, is most kind.
The angel message heard on Juda's plain Centuries gone is heard and heard again.
"Glory to God, peace and good will" the song
In ceaseless rhythm age to age goes on.

The sun is setting ruddy in the west,
The purple shades supplant the gold of day,
And childish faces, heavy with their sleep,
And limb and body, tired out with their play,
Turn into bed to drift away in dream
To lands far distant, to a fairy realm.
Where play and kindness rule and reign supreme.
The older folk sit late beside the fire
Strange anecdote and story to relate.
And ruddy embers seem to conjure up Stories of fun and valor long gone by Then, one by one, retiring, they depart
And leave the big log burning on the hearth.
The smoke curls upward with a mystic spell
Which in its language says that all is well.
The night is still. The silver gleaming snow
Is heaped in drifts by breezes as they blow
The midnight strikes; the bell-rings sweet and clear.
"Christmas shall linger with us through the year."

A Christmas Question

By Earle Hooker Eaton

IF a pretty girl were standing

With her roguish eyes
a-twinkle
And her rounded cheeks aglow—

IF a pretty girl were waiting,
Shy, expectant, coy and glad,
Would you turn and run like sixty,
And, if so, which way,
my lad?

THE RIGHT CHRISTMAS WAY

By MRS. H. L. MONTY.

(Copyright, 1912, by American Press Association)

"Oh, Mrs. Everly, I just thought I'd drop in and talk Christmas to you. It's all I hear at home, and I—"

Alice Miller was a very dear young friend of Edna and Vera Everly, and Christmas and all the wonderful secrets belonging to it had always been discussed as one family. She was amazed when Mrs. Everly turned abruptly and said: "Alice, don't. Please don't talk Christmas this year."

Alice hurried upstairs, where Edna and Vera were brooding over the same complaint, given them the evening before.

Edna was the first to speak. "I don't understand mamma at all. Before she has always been the first to begin the Christmas gifts, and—and she never tired of planning."

Vera was angry. "Last evening papa said: 'I think, mother, that Santa will have to unload that fine dining cabinet Bradelough's for you Christmas. The one with—' And that was as far as he got. Mamma said: 'Father, that will do. Christmas will not be mentioned to me this year.' And—and this morning mamma went to the furniture store, bought that table and has it all set for dinner. I know papa will be hurt."

Alice jumped up. "Come on, girls. Let's go over and console Aunt Betty. The girls told her their Christmas troubles and about the dining table. She was very quiet for a few seconds. 'What did you give your mamma last Christmas?' she asked."

"The Alexander one for the parlor," both girls quickly answered. "It gives us a dollar every month for—"

bank, to be kept just for a Christmas gift for mamma, and then he adds to, 'It for what is wanted.'"

"Yes'm," quietly answered Aunt Betty. "And the Christmas before?"

"A brass bed for the spare bedroom."

"Yes'm! And the Christmas before?"

asked Aunt Betty again.

The girls hesitated a little, then, "A—"

The girls left Aunt Betty an hour later, and Christmas was not mentioned in the Everly household, but the girls and their father looked unusual by mysterious and happy.

Christmas morning dawned crisp and clear, the spirit of the day abounding everywhere.

Edna and Vera anxiously awaited their mother, having sent their father to bring her to their Christmas room, which they had trimmed up in evergreens and bells, after she had retired the evening before.

They met her with tender caresses and led her to a chair prepared purposely for her. Edna brought her gift, a beautiful collar of her own work, and pinned it on with a brooch, in which was her birthstone.

The mother drew the face of her first child to her and kissed her, a tear dropping on the upturned face.

Vera had quietly drawn near and laid a bundle of dark blue silk on her mother's lap. "For the dearest mother ever," she said as her mother drew her closely to her, sealing the precious words with a kiss.

Then, father came forward and, taking her hand in his, said as he slipped his gift on her finger, "What I couldn't give the dear little woman when we started out together I give her now."

The bewildered woman saw through fast falling tears a magnificent diamond sparkling on her hand.

"O h," said Vera, "such a time as I've had keeping secrets!"

"The happiest Christmas I've known for years," remarked Mr. Everly.

"Me, too," exclaimed Alice Miller. "I tried to have some one let me in with my little gift for the queen of the household, and no one heeded my call, so I came anyway."

And a lovely couch was added to her presents.

"This is what Christmas means; give to each for their own." And Edna started the ball rolling for a general Christmas frolic.

"Twas the night before Christmas, And all through the flat Not a creature was stirring— Too crowded for that."

"FOR THE DEAREST MOTHER EVER."

set of leather dining chairs, and a Morris chair for—

"Yes'm," Aunt Betty's eyes snapped.

"Who sits in the Morris chair?"

"Mamma put it in the library," Vera answered.

"And papa sits in it and reads every evening and Sundays."

Then they all thought Vera had gone crazy. She laughed, sang, jiggled, and then with a hug she nearly upset Aunt Betty and said, "Girls, what silly folks we all have been!"

diately brought the hearing to a close, made an extension of Swift's parole for 60 days, that a motion may be made to have the new evidence submitted.

"I have spent more time and made a deeper investigation on this case than any other pardon case has received from me while I have been governor of Michigan," declared the governor. "If Mr. Swift is innocent of the crime for which he has been convicted and sentenced, and there is any way by which the postal card evidence can be submitted to the circuit judge, then I say let that course be taken. Personally I am convinced that the Griffin had wrote the card, yet I do not desire to be instrumental in passing upon any case that the courts can deal with. I would consider it a violation of my oath of office should I take any action aside from what I have done, without first giving the courts an opportunity to pass upon this new found evidence."

A petition signed by 777 residents of this county was presented protesting against the governor issuing a pardon. Should the matter again appear before the executive office it will be up to Governor-Elect Ferris to decide and the people of this county seem to think that before him Swift will receive his just deserts.

Government Buys Scales.

A special dispatch from Washington says that Postmaster General Hitchcock placed the largest order for scales ever made, 30,000. They are to be used in postoffices for parcels post service and will cost $77,300. Two hundred of the large offices will be supplied with automatic springless scales; 10,000 smaller offices with high grade beam scales and other offices will receive the best spring balances, each with a capacity of twenty pounds.

FREIGHT ORDER IS MODIFIED

Will Accept Perishable Goods as Freight in Less Than Car Lots.

Shippers Must Assume all Risks Absolving Road from all Damages.

Agents of the Pere Marquette railroad have been directed by General Freight Agent C. M. Booth to modify the rule not to accept shipments of perishable freight in less than car lots. But if the shipper desires to send his freight in ordinary cars he must do so at his own risk, absolving the carrier from all claims for damages. The order says: "Commencing at once and until weather conditions warrant, the safe transportation of perishable freight in ordinary cars, agents will refuse to accept such shipments (unless fully released), and advise the shippers that all perishable property which is liable to damage by freezing should be forwarded by express. "If shippers still desire to forward such products by freight in ordinary cars you are authorized to accept same from any shippers who execute a release to this company covering liability by freezing. "Form 82 covers general liability, which may be signed by shippers in triplicate, one copy to be sent to the auditor of traffic accounts, one copy to be retained by the agent, and one copy by the shipper. Form 83 is to be used on individual shipments forwarded by shippers not signing the general release. "Shippers are pleased that the Pere Marquette are accepting perishable freight in less than car lots, and intimate that they will ship and watch results. It was said that a good many customers were willing to co-operate in express shipments. It was admitted that the emergency action taken against the Pere Marquette rule not to accept such freight, was chiefly to prevent similar action by all the roads. Some of the shippers are not pleased with the modification of Pere Marquette order not to accept perishable freight in less than car lots and the clause requiring shippers who ship in ordinary cars to release the carrier from liability is the point of objection.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Will Meet Friday Evening at Home of Mr. and Mrs.
W. J. Rachow.

The Charlevoix Historical society will meet with Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Rachow, Friday evening, December 20. The following is the program: Music, piano solo, Irene Anld. Paper, Irish Dramas and Players; Mrs. J. L. Crane. Social intermission. Music, vocal solo, Mrs. W. J. Rachow. Reading, Judge O'Shea Hears Hamlet, Mrs. A. F. Bridge.

NOT FOR SWIFT

Rev. Holden A. Putnam Believes that Justice Should be Given the People.

We have received the following from Rev. Holden A. Putnam which we are sure will be pleasant reading for his hosts of friends in this locality.

"I notice that it is stated in the papers that all the directors of Benlah Home are personal friends of Mr. Swift. I do not know how they came by that impression, but whoever has given out that word has spoken without keeping within the truth. As one member of the board I wish it understood by my Charlevoix friends that I cannot lend my influence to protect Swift from the penalty which has been pronounced upon him. I regret to say that I regard him as a very dangerous man to have in any community, and I am disposed to trust the courts in the decision which they have reached."

"This is just what we expected from a man of Mr. Putnam's high character."

Will Take Long Journey.

John Mitchell of this city, expects to leave next Friday for Vancouver. From there he will sail for Australia where he is called by the illness of Mrs. Mitchell's brother. Mr. Mitchell will accompany his brother-in-law to Scotland and expects to return home some time in May.

NEW VILLAGE OFFICERS

Many Changes Made by Council at Pellston at Last Meeting.

Things happened in the Pellston council at its last meeting. First the resignation of Alderman Bert L. Johnson was accepted, and following this his resignation as chief engineer was accepted. James R. Bryant was then made his successor, and following this, it being shown that Village President Eugene C. Rust has ceased to be a resident, Edwin C. Bogardus was made new president, and his place as alderman was filled by Nicholas Sage. Then President Bogardus appointed Stephen A. Johnson chief engineer to fill that vacant office, following which he declared the office of street commissioner vacant and appointed Thomas H. Barley.

Entertained Friends.

Mrs. Sam Levinson entertained a few friends Thursday at five o'clock tea for Miss Elizabeth Levinson of Detroit. The guests were the Misses Constance Iddings, Etta O'Neil, Caro Meech, Lila Campbell and Hazel Price. In the evening they were joined by Donald Campbell, Otto Hines, Leo Carey, Paul Purdy and Mr. and Mrs. Myer Levinson.

The evening was spent in an old fashioned taffy pull and music. Every one pronounced Mr. and Mrs. Levinson royal entertainers.

VERDICT FOR $1080

Given Plaintiff in Duffy-Chartes Case by Circuit Court Jury.

The most of last week in Circuit Court was taken up with the case of Duffy vs. Chartes. In this case the plaintiff asked for damages alleged to have been received by the improper setting of a fractured arm, by the defendant, a practicing physician of Boyne City, about two years ago. The case was hard fought. J. M. Harris and A. G. Urquhart of Boyne City, appearing for the plaintiff, while W. S. Mesick of Petoskey, looked after the interests of the defendant.

The case will probably be appealed.

HIS RISE TO POWER

denty responsive. These men are—the people. The power of it—the power and the glory! He thrills under a sense of oneness with them. Murdoch and his machine, Sheehan and his control, seem far away, unreal, impossible.

The candidates, properly named and their party of distinguished citizens are on the platform. The benches are filled. Around them stands a throng of men, mostly farmers, who in the rush for seats have been too slow. John, sandwiched in between Sheehan and Congressman Jenkins, looks out over the audience, a strange question in his eyes. He is seeking a "reason," as though it were to be found written on the faces of the men before him.

The speaking begins. After a short preliminary speech the chairman introduces Beck, candidate for treasurer, as an inconsiderable now as he will be when in office. Then comes Parrott, a famous corporation lawyer, whose features somehow suggest that he is well named. He is adept in the use of those phrases which elicit enthusiasm, but do not convince. After him Mark Sherrod, state senator, a tall, suave man with a magnetic something about him. One of his eyes has a slight cast and gives his face a sinister expression which not all his undoubted attraction can remove. He is a coming man. Already a power in the big eastern city, it is whispered that he is planning to succeed Beck in the treasuryship. And after him the Hon. G. Washington Jenkins, congressman from the district. Lincolnian in figure, shrill and nasal of voice, but with the old campaigner's fund of stories and a rough and ready eloquence that catches the crowd in spite of his thin worn arguments.

The front seats roar their approval. From the fringe of farmers, Jim Sheehan observes, comes only grim silence. There is an uneasy sense that Jerry Brent's suspicions have not been allayed.

Through it all John sat, hardly moving. But within him was tumult. He was contrasting the grandiloquent, virtuous phrases with the machine as he had seen it. And he knew that in the devices of which he could not help hearing hints in his campaigning he had caught but a glimpse of the thing, the machine. He did not believe that good employs evil to its ends; by its agencies a cause was to be judged. He glanced along the line of those who profited by it—Sheehan, Beck, Parrott, Sherrod, Mitchell. The line was lost in the mist of his incomplete knowledge. This knowledge, his rankling suspicions, Brent's questionings, rose up to confront him, demanding a "reason." He could not find it. And the people—the sturdy, patient, hard-headed men on the benches—were they such dolts as to be fooled by the hollow mockery being enacted before them? He could not believe it. And yet he—he who doubted—was expected to play a part in the machinery, to give the lie to his inner consciousness, to be before the issue in the minds of the listeners, to take his place in the ranks of the machine. The speech in his pocket burned to the skin.

The tumult was still raging when the Hon. Mark Jenkins concluded his florid peroration and the applause died down. Vaguely, as from a distance, John heard the chairman introduce "New Chelsea's candidate" and the sudden cheers that rose. He did not realize, although Parrott and Sherrod did, that in the cheers was a quality not felt in the other greetings that night. He rose mechanically. He hardly knew when Sheehan, grasping his arm, shouted into his ear: "Don't forget the state ticket. Play it up hard!"

He stood silent before them. The well-camouflaged speech, with its smooth periods, the dramatic allusions, to which his clear, flexible voice lent itself so beautifully, refused to be uttered. He could not speak the lie he had prepared; a "reason" he had not.

At last words came. In a dry, suppressed voice. He did not mean to be facetious, and no one laughed at his grave, protesting irony. "We have heard tonight of the past glories of our party, and of glories that are of the nation. I shall not repeat, lest repetition dull their point. I have been asked not to forget the state ticket, in fact, to play it up hard. I need hardly speak for the gentlemen who have so eloquently spoken for themselves. I presume they do not wish to be saddled with responsibility for any of my shortcomings, nor do I wish to be judged by theirs. I am a candidate for office. If you think me the sort of man to administer that office honestly and well, without fear or favor, and as my own man, I shall be happy. If you don't think that, you can't believe that any party's history will make me an honest official. And that's all I can say."

He turned and walked toward the rear of the platform. The silence continued. Sheehan fell back. The fringe of farmers stood motionless, bewildered, slow to grasp the significance of the short speech. The silence of the silence of Jim Sheehan, first to recover presence of mind, carried over the crowd to Main street.

"For God's sake start a time or something!" This to the band.

Some one laughed. The band began to play "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," of all times! People began to rise from their seats. It was not necessary for the chairman to announce the end of the meeting.

On the stage John faced a wrathful tableau—Parrott, Sherrod and Sheehan.

"Don't forget the state ticket. Play it up hard!"

han. "What the h—!" began Sheehan, but the suave Sherrod, minus his snarling, interrupted. "What do you mean? If you can't support the ticket, you had no right to speak at all. You abuse courtesy, young man."

"Not yours, at any rate," John answered, and walked from the stage.

He made his way quickly behind him and out toward the crowd. He was dazed at his own act. A heavy sense of treachery was upon him, yet he could not have done otherwise. He had not even for the curious glances many of them more friendly than he could have believed, cast toward him. Walking swiftly with eyes cast down, he would have passed without noting the fashionable throng in front of his home had not a voice from it called to him.

"John, John!"

Why Christmas Should Be Spent at Home

It is the fashion nowadays, alas, to cry down Christmas, and it is fast becoming a "can't be bothered with it" sort of day. It is looked upon as a nuisance because Christmas tide brings with it a necessary increase of expenditure in the form of the and presents.

It is becoming more and more the fashion—fashion to be bothered to take less notice of Christmas and spend it away from home where there will be "plenty of fun." In the good old days spending Christmas anywhere but at home was never for one moment dreamed of. Preparations were made months beforehand. Geese and turkeys were fattened, plum puddings were made, prospective guests were borne in mind, and the girls of the home fell to thinking of new schemes for decorations. Now could anything be more delightful than making Christmas plans at least two months beforehand so as to keep the festive season right royally? All this sort of thing kept the family together, for when the winter evenings brought them nearer and nearer to Christmas day it made them see how necessary each one was to the other in the way of helping and suggesting as regards presents for So-and-so, holly for this room and mistletoe for that. Gradually it dawned on every one how dear the home was to all and how still more precious were the parents and children to one another.

When Christmas day did come it was a time of perfect happiness, but money and satisfaction to every guest and every member of the family. In Christmas is not spent at home what becomes of the family gathering, the delight of decorating, the care and thought the happy mother has expended on the cooking of the dinner and to crown all, the praise of the Christmas pudding, which by the consent of one and all invariably is "the finest pudding I have ever eaten?" No praise of a Christmas pudding ever comes amiss to a housewife's heart, and if Christmas is not spent at home the dinner will fall flat. There is no family gathering, no noisy, good humored chaff, and there is not that subtle, indefinable something at work which binds the family closer together, heats up old fires, opens up new friendships and wipes away all bitterness, that is so marked a feature in a good, humely Christmas gathering.

There have been more reconciliations, more "divided houses" brought together again, more eyes made dim through a mist of happy tears at some difference or misunderstanding made clear by a Christmas gathering at home than at any other season or place. Charles Dickens, the novelist at Christmas, who did more for Christmas than any one can ever guess, had had a slight difference with Thackeray. He met him on the steps of his club on Christmas morning, hesitated then held out his hand, which Thackeray grasped with all the warmth of his great heart. Both men returned to their family gathering at home, feeling better and happier men.

Without a doubt a family gathering at this festive and joyful season knits the bond of love and good fellowship closer than at any other time. Old slights and hurts are forgotten; hard men of business relax and soften at the sight of the children who many a time have drawn out all that is best in them after it has lain dormant for years, until they have forgotten they had a tender side to their nature at all. Yes, without a doubt home is the place for Christmas. "Oh, it will be so dull and uninteresting at home!" is often the cry. It will only be dull to those who make it so.

And if there is a vacant chair or two, which alas, can never be refilled, away the silent tear and be thankful that you are spared to taste the joys of still another lonely Christmas. Your example of spending the festive season will most assuredly instill the love of the yearly family gathering into the younger generation, who will emulate your ideas in future years. Posterity will be indebted to you for showing how to keep up a good old Christmas which was suffering from a slump in the twentieth century.

By all means, then, spend Christmas at home, decorate your house, remember the postman, the butcher, the sexton and even your wife's or husband's relatives. However poor you are you can be rich in mind, thoughts and cheery words. When you sit down to the table—don't care whether it groans with turkeys and plum puddings laid for twenty or thirty or whether it merely trembles under the weight of much scented fare and places laid for only three or four—if your heart is in the right place you will say: "Here's to a happy Christmas. Thank God we are at home!"—Victoria Magazine

"Christmas Gift! Saw Ye First!"

CHRISTMAS IN RAINBOW CANYON

By ADDISON HOWARD GIBSON.

[Copyright, 1912, by American Press Association.]

After sketching for two months in various parts of the Rockies, where he had been trying to forget that he was the miserable fellow in the west, Claude Extrum, artist unmarried, as he styled himself, turned his face toward his lonely mountain cabin among the pines in Rainbow canyon.

Purposely he had shunned Denver, declining the invitation of two artist friends to a big Christmas reception. He did not want to run the possibility of meeting Aldyce. It would be painful to both, since her father had denounced him as a "good for nothing fortune hunting dabbler."

Art must first be mastered, the critics won, then if Aldyce had not forgotten, his great dream would become sweet reality. But what if she should forget him? There was a capriciousness in the sex that was quite beyond his understanding.

It was noon when he reached the large cabin among the pines. The first room he visited was the studio, gay with warm colored Indian blankets and the walls covered with sketches by his own brush and a few copies of the masters. On his easel was an unfinished picture, just as he had left it when he went away in the latter part of October. He drew aside the cloth, brushed off the dust and looked into the laughing brown eyes of a lovely girl. Underneath was penciled the name "Aldyce."

With a deep drawn breath he replaced the cover and went into the kitchen. In the large zinc lined provision box he found that Joe Clark, the prospector who had looked after the cabin during Claude's absence, had obeyed his instructions by leaving a sack of flour, some beans, sugar, part of a ham and dried venison.

"Now I'll have a supper after my own appetite," he declared, making a fire in the little stove.

Presently a pot of beans, with a piece of ham to give flavor, was bubbling away. Filling the room with its savory steam. Then Claude swept the floor, wiped the accumulated dust off the simple furniture and proceeded to make a lonely house look comfortable.

"I must decorate to be in spirit with the season," he said, after scanning walls and unadorned mantel shelf.

By the time the young man returned with his arms full of decorations a cold wind was racing down the pass driving a steadily increasing fall of snow and sleet before it.

"Gee! Old Boreas is sending me some Christmas weather with all the frills," he soliloquized, making a run for the shelter of the cabin.

Claude had scarcely put the last of the mountain holly on the walls and built a cheerful log fire in the fireplace in the studio when the door burst open, letting in a dash of snow, in the midst of which stood a slender youth in a furry overcoat and cap, with huggles over his eyes.

"Well, can't you come in and shut the door?" demanded the artist impatiently as he stared at the apparition before him.

"I must look the Pin posing as old Santa, don't I?" asked the boy. "There with a sack of flour, sugar, and a ham, as I live and what?"

Turning on a prolonged whistle, Claude Extrum deposited his guest in the kitchen.

"Hal Bannister," he cried. "Where did you drop from?"

"From the snow clouds," answered the youth, hugging the surprised artist. "This is some luck, all right. Finding shelter, and just think of its being your mountain retreat. Aldyce is out there in the car. The machine broke down just below your cabin."

"Aldyce in the car out in this storm?" cried Claude, buttoning up his coat and rushing to the door.

"Yes. We were on our way to Frazier's, up Bear canyon," Hal shouted his explanation as he clung to his companion's arm through the snowy gale. "The Fraziers are giving an old fashioned Christmas eve party at their ranch house. You know Aldyce and Dell Frazier were great pals at school, so Aldyce was bound to go to the party. I was sure I knew the road there, but this snow came on so suddenly I was a little confused, where the roads fork. Aldyce insisted this was the right way, so we came up the wrong canyon."

The artist paid scant heed to young Bannister's explanation. As they sturdily breasted the keen, snow laden wind toward the crippled car he was thinking

"HELP! HELP!" SHE CRIED IN MERE TERROR.

ing what a strange prank fate had played on him. He had wanted to bury himself in his mountain cabin, sixty-five miles away from Aldyce, and here she was, snowbound at his door.

The wrecked automobile in the snow tempest looked like a red rock half buried in raging whitecaps near a stormy shore. In the back seat sat a girl veiled and clad in rich furs.

"Aldyce!" exclaimed Claude, opening the door wide enough to admit his head.

"We are uninvited guests," laughed the girl, giving him one of her small gloved hands. The girl was the more rational of the two, the young artist being too confused to offer the customary courtesies of host.

"Come, Claude, why don't you ask us in? I'm getting cold," she reminded him. "Perhaps you want me to freeze stiff and stand out here so you can have a real model for a famous painting entitled 'Frozen in a Motorcar,'" she laughed lightly.

Without a word in reply she felt her self lifted in the man's strong arms. The next second he was hurrying her away to the cabin.

"Help, help!" she called in mock terror. "Hal, bring the suit cases. The suitcases are in the car, aren't they?"

Claude Extrum deposited his guest in a great easy chair in front of the blazing pine log on the fireplace. Then he helped her remove her wraps. Presently she sat back, pale at her ease, her handsomely shod feet on an improvised footstool. While her face glowed in the dancing firelight.

"What are you cooking, Claude, that smells so tantalizing good?" demanded Hal, sniffling robustly as he found a place for the suit cases in an unoccupied corner of the studio.

"Not a Christmas turkey, you young gastronomer," answered Claude, his somberness leaving him under the merry mood of his two unexpected guests. "It's beans—pure, unadulterated beans," he added, with a trace of pride. "This is a regular bean soup evening," observed Aldyce. "I'm sure I shall enjoy it."

"I want the largest bowl in your china collection," ordered Hal, asking the artist to sift flour for his biscuits. "Nature has endowed me with a big sized attachment for bean soup."

"The pot is full," said Claude, lifting the lid to give the boys a peep. "But if you advise an extension we might bring the wash boiler into service."

It was a merry meal to which they sat down as the early dusk of Christmas eve began to creep into the rustic studio. Hal declared the bean soup was nectar, and Aldyce herself pinned up her sleeves and made delicious coffee. But the reaction came to Claude at the close of the feast. He suddenly pushed back his chair from the table and sat moodily staring into the crumbling embers on the hearth.

Aldyce regarded the young man's churlish countenance for a short time in silence, a mysterious twinkle in her dark eyes. Then she arose and walked over to the window.

"Hal," she called to her brother, who showed symptoms of dozing in his chair, "the snow has almost stopped. I want you to go out and see if the car is still properly covered."

With a yawn the young fellow obeyed, whistling merrily as he trudged down the canyon.

Quickly Aldyce opened her suit case, took out a long envelope and laid it before the artist.

"A Christmas gift for you," she said simply, the mysterious smile now lurking at the corners of her mouth. "Open it, Claude."

He obeyed and a crisp check for $3,000 dropped into his hand. Then he read the accompanying note:

Dear Old Pat—The enclosed check is for your painting, "Rainbow Canyon in Summer," sold to the famous art collector, Mr. Stevens of New York. He wants the same scene in winter at your own price. He says to be prepared for some orders from his friends. Merry Christmas!

"Aldyce, how did you learn I was here?" he asked, moving toward her. "Lawrence told me. I was in the studio when Mr. Stevens bought your picture on exhibition there. He was so happy for you he let out your secret that you were coming here to bury yourself for the holidays," she replied.

"Then I guessed."

She hesitated, blushed, looking at him with languid eyes.

"Dell Frazier's party," he finished boldly. "How dare you insinuate that I fabricated that as an excuse to bring you the good news of your fortune?" she taunted him, assuming a tone of injury.

He sprang toward her. With a little cry of felicitous fright she eluded him but stopped under the hanging lamp, where a dancing spray of mistletoe touched her hair. Then he kissed her.

"What kind of a fellow is this Mr. Holloway?" asked the traveling saleswoman of the earnest prospector.

"Honest as the day is long," answered the village merchant.

"How do you know that he is?"

"He says so himself. But speaking personally, I advise interested parties to keep an eye on him after sundown."—Cleveland Plain Dealer

MOTHER, I've never had a Christmas tree," grieved little Bobbini Loring one December day.

Mrs. Loring looked down at the sweet little face, and her own, so like it, grew more sad than its wont.

"I know it, dearie," she said. "When your dear father was alive you were too little to have one, and since he has been gone we have been so poor that Santa Claus feels that he did very well to fill our stockings. Don't you remember the lovely stocking full of presents you received last year?"

Bobbini shook her sunny head disconsolately. "I sure member it, but it wasn't a tree, mother, and I would so much love to have a tree just like the ones I've read about in my books."

Mrs. Loring smiled sadly at her small daughter's pretty conceit. Bobbini's "reading" consisted of gazing at the pictures in her little books and glibly reciting, from memory the stories her mother had so often read to her.

"A Christmas tree would be perfectly lovely," murmured Bobbini as she went back to her picture books.

"I'll try and see if I cannot get one this year," mused Mrs. Loring. "but they do charge so fearfully for everything here in Highbury. That's the worst of living in an expensive suburb, but I did it for the best. I was sure that I could obtain more music pupils here than in the city where there is so much competition."

Edith Loring had done very well since the death of her husband three years before. Frank's illness had been a long one, and when at last he was laid to rest beside the tiny grave where Bobbini's twin brother rested there was little money left for the young widow and her child to start life anew.

She had kept her piano, and although never a brilliant musician, she was an admirable teacher and found many young pupils in the pretty suburban community where she elected to settle with her little daughter. The cottage they lived in was a tiny one on the outskirts of the town and had been a rather dilapidated affair, but Edith had spent money, time and effort to transform it into a cozy nest for them.

"It seems a pity that I cannot vide a Christmas tree for the little murmured Edith Loring as she bent over her sewing. "I wonder how I can economize in order to save the amount Smith wanted $1 apiece for every tree

he had last year."

Bobbini, still sitting on the floor in the corner, was gazing intently at the colored picture of a gayly decorated Christmas tree. Suddenly her brown eyes opened wider and a smile curved her lips. She jumped up hurriedly.
"Mother, dear, I believe I'll go out and play," she said.

"Bring your things in here, Bobbi-ni, and be sure and stay in the sunshine."

Presently Bobbini skipped down the path to the gate, dragging her sled over the hard packed snow. She was a pretty sight in her red cloak and kalted cap and leggings all of the same cherry hue even to the mittens on her diminutive hands.

Next door to the Loring's cottage was the Moore place, a handsome brick structure set in the midst of a park-like expanse of undulating lawns and wooded slopes. A grove of young Norway spruces dipped down to the stone wall that divided the cottage from the great place beyond.

Bobbini often played in front of the Moore place, for the trees overhung the high iron fence and shaded the sidewalk in summer, while in winter the sloping walk made a very safe hill-top which a small girl might coast. The Moore place was closed most of the time.

On this crisp December morning, however, Bobbini did not stop on the sidewalk. She walked boldly through the open gate and up the driveway, where there were tracks of horse's hoofs and ruts where a sleigh had passed.
By these signs Bobbini knew that the lonely gentleman who sometimes occupied the Moore place was at home.

Now she glimpsed him walking among the trees with a Gordon setter at his heels. He was a tall, straight figure of a man with prematurely gray hair and severe features. Bobbini had heard people speak of him as "Judge Moore" and "the judge," and she knew that he was a very rich man to be treated with great awe and respect.

approach and harsh voices were tempered when people spoke to her, and because of this experience and also because she was blessed with the sweet trustfulness of innocent childhood she approached Judge Moore with more of hope than fear to her heart.

Judge Moore always came down to the old homestead when he had a difficult case to think over. Now he was pacing to and fro on a little beaten track his feet had made on the snow under the trees. He enjoyed the stillness of the place, the pungent odor of the evergreens and the crisp tang of the winter air. Overhead the sky was cloudless and from the high trees back of the house blue jays were scolding.

"I'm very glad to see you," piped Bobbini with her best company manner.

Judge Moore started and looked down at the small red coated figure, beside which the setter stood wagging
a friendly tail.

"Why, I'm glad to see you too," he smiled down at her, and Bobbini wondered why people seemed afraid of such a handsome gentleman and one who had such a deep, kind voice.

"I'm not Red Riding Hood, but I know all about her," returned Bobbi-ni earnestly.

Judge Moore lifted his eyebrows in mock surprise. "Not Red Riding Hood, eh? Well, you look just like her, and my dog, Prince, looks very much like the wolf."

Bobbini's dimples showed in an appreciative smile.

"I came to talk about Christmas trees," she said without further introduction.

"Christmas trees! Bless my soul!
It is almost Christmas, isn't it?"

"Yes, and I never had a Christmas tree," Bobbini could not suppress the longing in her tones.

"Never did?" There was genuine surprise in the Judge's tones now.
"So you came to talk it over with me?"

"Yes, please. You have so many trees right next to my house. They are just like the trees in my picture books and like the one at Sunday school last year. Mother says I might have one, only probably Santa Claus knows we're quite poor and that he thinks he has done very well to fill my stocking. But a tree would look so lovely in our parlor!"

"And you would like to have one of my trees?" asked the Judge kindly.

"Well, I thought maybe if you didn't mind perhaps I could write to Santa Claus and tell him if he didn't have a tree to spare for me you wouldn't care if he took one from all those pretty ones next door to my house."

"That's a splendid idea! Shall we go and look at them now?"

"Bobbini Loring."
"Bobbini! What an odd name for a little girl!"

"It is two names," sighed Bobbini.
"I had a little brother Bobby, but he died, and father said that I must be son and daughter now, so they called me Bobbini. My own name is Nellie.
Father is with Bobby now, and so there's only mother and me."

"Oh," said the Judge, and his hand closed tighter on Bobbini's. "You live in the little cottage?"

"Yes, and mother teaches music."
They had reached the spruce grove now and could look down upon the little gray cottage with a friendly wreath of smoke curling from the chimney.

"That's where I live," said Bobbini proudly.

"Suppose we pick out a tree now, and you can tie a ribbon upon it so that Santa Claus will know what one to bring to you, eh?"

"Oh, that will be perfectly lovely!"
squealed Bobbini.

Without a qualm Judge Moore selected his finest spruce for Bobbini's Christmas tree. Gravely he untied one of the little girl's red hair ribbons and tied it to the tree.

"Now, he won't make any mistake!"
she cried as they went back.

That evening Bobbini told her mother the story of her adventure in the Moore place and how the kind Judge had marked a "beautiful" tree for Santa Claus to bring to them.

So Mrs. Loring wrote the letter to Santa Claus and the very next morning went over to the Moore place to apologize for Bobbini's intrusion and to assure the Judge that she could not permit him to sacrifice his handsome spruce for one little girl's Christmas.

But Judge Moore had a will of his own and a most winning manner, and it did not take him long to convince Mrs. Loring that the pleasure was all on his side of the stone wall.

"Perhaps you will permit me to call on Christmas morning and see the tree? That will be the greatest reward." He smiled down at her, and Edith Loring found herself telling him they would be very glad to see him.

The Judge walked to the gate with the lovely young widow, and Bobbini was delighted when she found that her mother would put no objection in the way of Santa Claus bringing the coveted tree.

It was a wonderful Christmas for Bobbini Loring. When Judge Moore called on Christmas morning to see the tree he discovered several large and interesting packages behind the tree, where Bobbini had supposed she had searched before.

Perhaps the following Christmas was the most wonderful for all three of them, for they found themselves living at the Moore house next door with a whole grove of trees to choose from, and he called her name, an "Mrs. Moore" and called the Judge "a fine fellow."

MARTIN BLOCK

The Dutch Patrol

By EDWARD CLARENCE STEDMAN

WHEN Christmas eve is ended,
Just at the noon of night,
Rare things are seen by mortal
That have the second sight.

In St. Mark's churchyard then
They see the shape arise
Of him who ruled Nieuw Amsterdam
And here in slumber lies.

His face beneath the close black cap
Has a martial look and grim,
On either side his locks fall wide
To the broad collar's rim.

His sleeves are slashed; the velvet coat
Is fashioned Hollandese
Above his fustian breeches, trimmed
With scarlet knots at the knees.

His leg of flesh is holed in silk;
His wooden leg is bound,
As well befits a conqueror's,
With silver bands around.

He reads the lines that mark
His tablet on the wall,
Where boldly "Petrus Stuyvesant" Stands out beyond them all.

Then into ranks they fall,
"They hold our memory dear,
Nor rust nor moss hath crept across,
Till last this many a year."

Then down the path he strides
And through the iron gate
Where the sage him men, his councilors
Their governor await.

Here are Van der Donck and Van Cour, Landt,
A triplet more of Vans,
And Hendrick Kip of the haughty lip

And Goyert Loockermans, Jan Jansen-Dam and Jansen,
Of whom our annals tell—
All risen this night their lord to greet
At sound of the Christmas bell.

Then into ranks they fall
And step out three by three,
And he of the wooden leg and staff
In front walks solemnly.

Along their wonted course
The phantom troop patrol
To see how fares Nieuw Amsterdam
And what the years unroll.

Direct after street and mill on mill,
From river bound to bound,
From old St. Mark's to Whitehall Point,
They foot the limits round;

From Maiden Lane to Corlear's Hook
The Dutchmen's pyren glow,
But never a word from their lips is heard
And none their passing know.

Here the first streak of dawn
St. Mark's again they near,
And by a vault the blue men halt
Their governor's voice to hear.

"Nynheeren," he says, "ye see
Each year our borders spread,
Lo, one by one the landmarks gone,
And marvel come instead!"

Not even a windmill left Nor a garden plot we knew,
And but a paling marks the spot
Where erst my pear tree grew.

Our walks are wrier still,
Perchance and if were best,
So little of world is left on earth,
To break no more our rest."

Thus speaks old Petrus doubtfully
And sinks his valiant head,
When on the roofs a sound of hoofs,
A rattling, patter, tread.

The bells of tender tinkle—
The Dutchmen plainly spy
St. Nicholas, who drives his team Across the roof tops high.

"Beshrew me for a craven!"
Cries Petrus, "All goes well!"
Our patron saint still makes his round
At sound of the Christmas bell.

So long as stanch St. Nicholas Shall guard these houses tall
There shall come no harm from hostile
No evil chance befall!

Ye youths, and the metics
Shall have their pouch filled;
The dutches and the looser,
And every home at guild.

Shall merrily thrive and flourish,
Good night, and be of cheer!
We may safely lay us down again
To sleep another year!"

Once more the pipes are waved,
Stout Petrus gives the sign,
The misty smoke enfolds them round,
Him and his bargains fine.

At which the Dutchmen have fled
Have vanished quite away,
And the creaking cack and the steepie cime Proclaim us Christmas day.

SANTA CLAUS IN THE CITY

By JAMES A. EDGERTON

Copyright, 1912, by American Press Association.

IN days of yore old Santa Claus
Had a delightful time
The chimneys all were big and wide
Through which he had to climb.
But nowadays our modern ways
Afford him little ease.
When he climbs through our skimpy flues
He has an awful squeeze.

They say he has an ample form,
With girth profound and vast,
And first thing anybody knows
Some day he'll get stuck fast.
But this is not the worst of it,
For how can Santa crawl
Into a modern city flat
That has no flues at all?

His bursting pack upon his back,
He clambers up the walls,
Climbs ladders like a steeplejack,
To make his midnight calls.
And once some city children saw
A roly poly shape
On Christmas eve go past their flat
Upon the fire escape.

With buildings twenty stories high
And flats on every floor,
More girls and boys who want more toys
Than ever were before,
The way poor Santa Claus is worked
Is certainly a shame,
But he is such a good old sport
He never quits the game.

If buildings should grow taller yet
And still more girls and boys
Keep being born, each one to get
A longer list of toys,
I do not know how Santa Claus
Can visit such a mob.
But, I'll be bound, he will be found,
As always, on the job.

Real Christmas Weather

THE greatest snowstorm in the experience of England began falling Dec. 24, 1830, and continued during Christmas day.
The snow in some places reached a depth of forty feet. All travel was blocked. There was no communication, not even between houses, and avalanches buried many people in their dwellings, where they were frozen.

Marion Center Grange.

Last week some errors occurred in the list of officers. The correct list is as follows:

Master, Nat Burns; overseer, Sam Straw; lecturer, Hattie Meggison; steward, William Paquette; chaplain, Edith Adams; treasurer, Harmon Himebach; secretary, Jennie Burns; assistant steward, Elmer Meggison; gate keeper, Clarence Meggison; ceres, Florence Meggison; pomona, Florence Withers; flora, Lydia Black; lady assistant steward, Mary Paquette; insurance director, Frank Smith.

Charlevoix Grange.

A large attendance is desired at the next meeting Monday evening, December 23. Election of officers. The program will consist of talks on the recent meeting of the state grange by worthy Master Ward and others. Also music and recitations.

Marion Center Gleaners.

The ancient order of gleaners met with Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Ingalls Saturday evening, December 14 for the election of officers which resulted as follows:

Chief gleaner, Walter Black; vice chief gleaner, Mrs. George Meggison; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. Walter Black; chaplain, Mrs. James Cook; lecturer, Mrs. Elmer Ingalls; gate keeper, Mr. Corb; inner guard, E. Reed; conductress, Mrs. Pasco.

About 22 members and all officers and one visitor were present. Dainty refreshments were served by the hostess and everybody enjoyed a good time.

SUSPENDED SENTENCE

Given I. Newhouse, of Boyne City, who it was alleged, ran a "blind pig."

It will be remembered that I. Newhouse, was arrested in Boyne City a few weeks ago for entertaining a "blind pig" at his home on Main street and brought to this city for a hearing. He pleaded guilty and the court suspended sentence. The United States court marshal immediately appeared upon the scene and arrested Newhouse for violating the United States revenue laws. The man was then taken to Grand Rapids where he appeared before Judge Sessions and again pleaded guilty. Upon recommendation of United States Revenue Officer, A. L. Conlter, the judge suspended sentence and let the man return home where his family is reported to be in destitute circumstances.

Newhouse appears to be repentant of his misdeeds and says he will reform and make an attempt to lead a more worthy life. The state ment is given out by the court that, by properly conducting himself, caring for his family and giving no other cause for complaint, his permanent release can probably be obtained.

Active Old Lady.

Mrs. Abigail E. Hill, who is visiting her sister, Mrs. H. P. Parmelee, was 83 years old last Sunday, but is as spry as most people at 50. Last summer she celebrated the sixtieth anniversary of her marriage.

Sixty-five years ago she graduated from a woman's college. Her father, Dr. L. H. Perry, was a cousin of Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry. As a boy he met George Washington many times.

Frank Lewis of the Belvedere resort is Mrs. Hill's nephew.

Notice.

Bottle Washed Ashore Containing Note from Captain of Rouse Simmons.

A dispatch from Chicago, under date of December 13, says: A bottle containing the last message from the schooner Rouse Simmons, which, with her crew of seventeen, foundered in Lake Michigan a fortnight ago, was picked up today on the beach near Sheboygan, Wis. The message was written on a sheet of paper torn from a log book and was signed by Capt. Herman Schmeemann.

It read: "Everybody, goodbye. I guess we are all through. The sea washed overboard load Thursday. During the night the small boat was washed overboard. Leaking badly. Engwald and Stiebel fell overboard Thursday. God help us."

PAROLE OF CRIMINALS

System has Proved to be Very Successful in This Circuit.

TRAVERSE CITY RECORD-EAGLE

Prints Interesting Interview with Judge
Mayne on Subject.

Few Fail to Make Good When Given Chance—Only Three out of 135 Went Wrong the Result of Experience in his Circuit.

The parole system for prisoners accused of different crimes which is Judge Frederick W. Mayne's favorite method of dealing with this class of offenders has worked out on his circuit with very flattering results. During the time that he has been applying this method 135 persons convicted of crime have been allowed to go on probation. This plan has only been put into effect when a proper showing has been made and when the one convicted is desirous of becoming a better citizen and wants to make a new start in life. Of this total number of cases 65 were from Charlevoix and Antrim counties and the balance from Grand Traverse and Leelanau counties. Judge Mayne has no reasons to regret giving prisoners another chance, for they invariably make good. Out of three exceptions have occurred, one of those being in Grand Traverse county when a probationer committed a crime and was sent to prison. Many instances have occurred where a person has made a mistake and after being allowed another chance to do better has gone out and made a good citizen of himself. In speaking of the theory and practice of the probation system Judge Mayne has the following to say:

"I have occupied the position of circuit judge a little over 13 years. Prior to my election to the bench I had held the position of judge of probate and prosecuting attorney for Charlevoix county.

"By reason of my experience in insane and criminal cases while discharging the duties of these offices, I became convinced that our system of dealing with law violators was defective in at least two important particulars: It did not protect the public, and in many cases was not just to the offender.

"In the work of criminal reform we may consider mankind as divided into two classes, the normal and the abnormal, the latter including both defectives and degenerates. The normal person is less liable to commit crime than the abnormal. This statement needs no proof. Experience teaches that the treatment of the offender should depend largely upon the class to which he belongs.

"Society must be protected. This is of first importance. That punishment may be just, the mental and physical condition of the one to be punished must be considered. While the defective and degenerate must frequently be restrained of their liberty to be just, it should not go beyond the point necessary for the protection of society. Many yet consider prison walls as essential to protection, as formerly the dungeon and extreme physical punishment was thought to be.

"It may be interesting and instructive here to call attention to Professor Liszt's three famous probabilities: The probability that any one will commit a crime is greater if he has already been punished; the probability that any one will commit a crime increases with the number of punishments he has already undergone; the probability that anyone who is released from punishment will commit a new crime in the shortest possible time increases with the length of sentence he has undergone.

"Starting as these three probabilities may appear, and fourth as we may be to accept them as true, that they have some foundation in fact we must admit, as statistics show that about 43 per cent of our convicts return to prison for crimes committed after their discharge.

"In contrast with this record I present the statistics for return of prisoners under our modern system of indeterminate sentence and probation. Under the former 25 per cent to 40 per cent are returned, while under probation (pre-sentence parole) system only 5 per cent. In comparing these statistics one might be justified in questioning their accuracy, but we must remember that only those cases that give most promise of reform are admitted to probation. My own experience, and I believe the experience of every judge in Michigan, will tend to prove the accuracy of the figures. The effect of the system by decreasing crime cannot be shown by statistics, but I believe the effect to be beneficial. Such has been my observation. I am certain that it has not caused crime to increase.

"Some time must elapse before we can arrive at a conclusion based upon statistics of our own experience. We have, however, the results of the practical working of the probation system in England. In the British Weekly of date September 19, 1912, it is reported that in proportion to population the number of prisoners has reached the lowest point with statistical record. Within the limits of the probation law, covering a period of 20 years, the decrease has been in male offenders 50 per cent, and in female 75 per cent. Is there any reason (Continued on page 4)

WILLIAM STRAW PASSED AWAY

Was One of Most Prominent Pioneer Residents of Marion.

Served Township as Clerk for 13 Years—Had Lived Here 31 Years.

William Straw, one of the pioneer residents of Marion township, died at his home in that township Tuesday, December 17.

William Straw was born in Newark, England, in 1817, and when two years old moved to Lincoln where he spent his boyhood days. He received his education at a Wesleyan Methodist Seminary. At the age of thirteen he became a carpenter's apprentice and served in this capacity for seven years.

In 1877 he was united in holy wedlock to Rose Kirk. From this union were born eight children, five of whom are living, two sons and three daughters, William K. and George Bessie Straw of Marion, Mrs. George Lamphere of Marion and Mrs. Nelson Tillotson of Hayes.

In 1880 Mr. Straw, with his wife and little daughter, then about one and one-half years old, left England and came to Detroit, where he worked at his trade, until the state of his health made it necessary for him to take up his abode in the country and consequently he came to Charlevoix thirty-one years ago where he has since resided with his family.

Here he filled his farm in an able manner and also served his township in the capacity of clerk for thirteen years.

A kind husband and father, honest and upright in all his dealings with his neighbors, he will long be missed in the community. Of him it can truly be said that the world is better for his having lived.

The funeral was conducted from the home Friday by Rev. Quinton Walker.

Organization Perfected at Meeting Held at Cadillac
Last Week.

The first annual meeting of the Western Michigan Land Dealers' association was held in the supervisors' room Tuesday afternoon of last week at Cadillac with President A. L. Denel of Harbor Springs, presiding. John T. Giltson, of Traverse City, acted as secretary. The minutes of the first meeting were read and approved and a committee consisting of James Graceen, Kalkaska; Isaac Koww, Holland and B. K. Hemmel, Manistee, were appointed to draft the by-laws and constitution of the association.

This meeting was called to perfect an organization of the land dealers of the twenty counties in which the Western Michigan Development bureau is doing business, thus tending to give prospective settlers in western Michigan a square deal when it comes to investing in real estate and to expose the work of the land sharks.

Among other business transacted a resolution was passed requesting Governor Ferris to advocate the enactment of a law by the next legislature similar to the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any individual, firm, corporation or association to sell or offer for sale any farm or lands at a fictitious valuation or represent the same as good productive land when the facts as to quality of the soil and land do not warrant any such affirmation. Upon conviction thereof a fine of not less than $25 or more than $100 or a jail sentence of not less than ten days or more than ninety days or both shall be imposed."

Announces Appointments.

Governor-Elect Ferris has announced that he will make the following appointments:

Railroad Commissioner, James Scully, Ionia.

Dairy and Food Commissioner, James W. Helme, Adrian.

Insurance Commissioner, John T. Winship, Saginaw.

Governor's Secretary, William P. Neshett, Big Rapids.

FRED SMITH DIES SUDDENLY

Had Served People of County Several Years as Public Official.

Veteran of the Civil War—Came to This County Thirty-five Years Ago.

Fred Smith, one of the best known men in Charlevoix county, died suddenly at his home in Hayes township, Saturday evening, of apoplexy.

Mr. Smith was born in Germany seventy years ago and came to this country when four years old, settling in Wisconsin, coming to this county thirty-five years ago, and settling in Hayes township on the farm where he died.

Mr. Smith followed the occupation of carpenter for several years. He represented his township on the board of supervisors for several years and for the past eight years has been a member of the County Board of Superintendents of the Poor, his official duties taking up the greater portion of his time.

In 1873 he was married, at Sheboygan, Wisconsin, to Miss Ella Kremma, who, with four children, Walter and David Smith of Hayes township, Mrs. James McNeil of Wisconsin and Mrs. Lillian Bartholomew of Hayes, survive him.

Mr. Smith served his country throughout the Civil War, as a member of the 21st Wisconsin Infantry, and bore upon his body the scars of several wounds. He was also a member of the Old Fellow fraternity, under whose auspices the funeral will be held from his late home Wednesday forenoon.

Mr. Smith was one of the best liked men in the county and the news of his death came like a distinct shock to his many friends.

Pleasantly Located.

Judge of Probate-elect Correll and family are now pleasantly located in the A. M. Burdick house on Antrim street. The judge informs us that it is his intention to spend every day in his office, as the growth of the county makes such a change necessary.

THIRTY FIVE LIVES WERE LOST

Nineteen Vessels Wiped Out of Existence
During Season.

ON GREAT LAKES THIS SEASON

Loss of Life not Quite as Heavy as Nineteen Eleven.

Biggest Property Loss was the Sinking of the Gayley in Lake Superior—Most Lives on the Rouse Simmons.

In the 1912 season of navigation on the great lakes now closing, nineteen vessels ended their existence, bringing total losses, thirty-five lives were lost and over 300 accidents of smaller importance occurred.

In 1911 thirty-nine lives were lost on the great lakes, $300,000 damage was done by collisions, $100,000 by fires and $250,000 by standings, groundings and harbor accidents. The biggest fire loss in 1911 was $300,000 when the North West burned at Buffalo.

The most important loss of the season now closing was the James Gayley, sunk in Lake Superior in a collision with the Kearsarge, the combined loss of ship and cargo being $300,000.

The loss of life would have been comparatively small this year had it not been for the sinking of the Rouse Simmons with its crew of sixteen men in Lake Michigan, December 1. Included in the list of thirty-three dead, too, are the five shipbuilders who were burned to death in the oil fire on the Cayahoga river.

Two lives were lost by the bursting of steam pipes in the engine room of the James Davidson on Lake Superior. When the Pine Lake sank near Belle Isle on October 21, one man lost his life. A sailor was washed overboard from the Fleetwood in Lake Huron and was drowned. When the Harvey D. Gouhier struck the tug Freeds, which was towing the Gouhier, four of the tug's crew drowned. Four more men lost their lives when the Three Sisters became waterlogged at Green Bay. Two were drowned when the sand boat Hustler was sunk by the Clinton in the St. Clair river a few weeks ago.

Total losses for the season were the coal laden Canadian steamer Iona, burned on Lake Ontario, May 20; Joseph C. Silt, hit by City of Detroit 11, and sunk; Canadian steamer Bothnia, sunk in St. Clair river as result of a collision with the S. S. Curry on June 20; Sidney C. McLeath, burned at Green Bay, June 28; Viking, abandoned to underwriters when it ran aground on Split Rock, Lake Superior; Columbia of Niagara Falls, burned July 5; Colligan, ore laden, tumbled to Lake Superior; S. K. Martin sprung a leak off Harbor Creek, Lake Erie, October 12, crew reaching shore in yawl; fishing tug Carrie E. foundered in Lake Huron, October 11, barge Marengo, pounded to pieces off Morgan's point, Lake Erie; Canadian steamer Keystorm ran ashore on Scow Island, St. Lawrence river, slid off the rocks and sank in 400 feet of water; barge Lucke, in tow of Junco, sank in Lake Ontario near Port Hope; Russell Sage, destroyed by fire while at dock, November 2; barge Hattie Wells, swamped by heavy seas on Lake Michigan and lost, November 6; South Shore, ran ashore near Port Sable, Lake Superior, Nov. 21, and pounded to pieces.

Mariners are of the opinion that many of the accidents could have been avoided had navigators paid more attention to the rules of navigation.

Mrs. Jacob VanDusen Called by Grim

Coughing at Night.

One bad cough can keep the whole family awake at night. Phil Disorheim, Schaffer, Mich., says: "I could not sleep on account of a bad cough, and I was very weak. I used Foley's Honey and Tar Compound and soon the cough left and I slept soundly all night." Ivy Drug Store.—Advertisement.

GOVERN YOURSELF.

Men and women often say they can't govern themselves. That is simply admitting they have defects of character which are their masters. They ought to make effort and see if they are not mistaken. The worst effects of lack of self control are on the health. It allows every kind of bad habit in eating, drinking, dressing and sleeping to gain possession of the person, and the result is a weak instead of a strong character. Never have to say you cannot govern yourself.

Croupy Coughs and Wheezy Colds

The quickest simplest way to rid the children of dangerous croupy coughs and wheezy stuffy colds is to give them Foley's Honey and Tar Compound. It gives almost instant relief and stops a cough promptly. It soothes and heals. Contains no opiates. Ivy Drug Store.—Adv.

The Difficult Persian Tongue.

Of the difficulties in the language of Persia a traveler writes: "The worst one uses in a letter are almost entirely different from those used conversationally, and those in an ordinary public history are again different. Then it is almost impossible to distinguish the tenses and, lastly, the adjective is generally indistinguishable from the substantive, and the line between an adjective and the term which it qualifies is the same as the sign of the possessive." For instance, the text "This is my beloved son" may be read in the Persian Bible "This is the son of my beloved" without the slightest violence to the grammar.

MAY PROVE FATAL

When Will Charlevoix People Learn the Importance of It?

Backache is only a simple thing at first.

But if you find it from the kidneys.

That serious kidney troubles may follow.

That dropsy or Bright's disease may be the fatal end.

You will be glad to know the following experience.

"This is the statement of a Charlevoix citizen.

Mrs. R. M. McKel, 214 Nason St., Charlevoix, Michigan, says: "I can recommend Doan's Kidney Pills highly. I had been troubled for several months by kidney disease. My body bloated quite badly and I had a weak back and severe pains in my kidneys. My rest was broken at night. I obtained Doan's Kidney Pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they have given me relief in every way."

"When your back is lame—remember the Name." Don't simply ask for a kidney remedy. Ask distinctly for Doan's Kidney Pills, the same that Mrs. McKel had—the remedy backed by home testimony.

Federal Cavalry Dash Toward Vicksburg—General Grant's Advance Is Slow—Plans of Campaign by the Commander in the Field In Conflict With Those of His Superiors—Grant Proposed a Land Attack; His Chiefs Favored an Attack From the River Front. Generals Sherman and Grant In Council—Confederates Prepare to Head Off a Land Attack—Army Communications Threatened by Cavalry

By Captain E. O. RULMER, Late U. S. Army. NOV. 23, 1862. General Washington's Federal cavalry dashed into the town of Grenada, Miss., in the rear of the Confederate army gunning Vicksburg from the north. At that date the Confederates, led by General J. C. Pemberton, who afterward became the stubborn defender of Vicksburg, held a position on the south bank of the Tallahatchie river, forty miles north of Vicksburg. The troops were part of the regular garrison of Vicksburg, who had moved out of the fortifications to meet and oppose the march of General U. S. Grant southward on the overland campaign against the noted Mississippi stronghold, which was set on foot in the early part of the month.

The purpose of Washburn's dash was to destroy the railroad behind Pemberton, but he failed to accomplish that. However, the raid showed Pemberton the weakness of his position. Washburn had ridden in from the northwest, coming from Helena, and was acting independent of Grant. Three days after Washburn's dash Grant's advance cavalry crossed the Tallahatchie above Pemberton's position, and these two movements, with the prompt crossing over of two columns of Grant's infantry, caused Pemberton to retire southward toward the Yallahs.

A Conflict in Plans.

The movement of Grant toward Vicksburg lacked rapidity for two reasons. He had to repair the railroads and the bridges as he advanced southward for the purpose of keeping up rail communication with his base in Kentucky and with Memphis, on the Mississippi, which was a rendezvous for troops sent to reinforce the army in the field.

For another thing, Grant's own status was not clearly defined. He had recently been appointed to the command of the department of Tennessee and supposed that he would control all the troops operating against Vicksburg.

But while the troops in central Mississippi were moving toward the point of concentration for attack on Pemberton, the war department at Washington prepared a plan for an attack down the Mississippi river from Memphis, and asked Grant to spare troops for the purpose. He had committed himself to the overland movement. In order to insure supplies for the troops all the provisions of the country, and these were in abundance, had been gathered into the stores. Grant believed that if necessary the army could live off the country it passed through on a lengthy campaign.

For some weeks, or all through the month of November, while the Federals were crossing from Tennessee into Mississippi, the outposts of both armies had frequently met in skirmishes, and General Pemberton was kept informed of the movements of the enemy as well as the strength of his force. Pemberton's headquarters were at Jackson, Miss., a point east of Vicksburg. He commanded all the about 40,000 men. The front line was under the leadership of General Earl Van Dorn, whose defeat at Corinth, Miss., in October had exposed Vicksburg to overland attack. Van Dorn had about 24,000 men, and 10,000 more were in garrison at Vicksburg and Port Hudson.

Grant Overruled.

Having brought his army into close touch with the enemy in the interior of Mississippi, Grant was loath to weaken his movement by detachments, large bodies of troops to support an attack along the water front. He believed that a steady advance overland would compel the Confederates to draw all their strength to the defense of the fortress. However, the river was the easier Federal approach, and the river held the key to the overland road to Vicksburg. Grant was to meet their strength on the river to make his progress tempted to take all his force against Pemberton, and Sherman joined him about the time his infantry crossed the Tallahatchie.

Grant and Sherman In Council.

There were weighty reasons against a divided movement upon Vicksburg over the land and water routes. The Confederates held interior lines and could easily use the same troops to fight Grant's column in Mississippi or the one going down the river, while these columns could only support each other by the long course back to Memphis and then to the point of danger many days' travel to the front. Seeing, however, that the war department was firm in its purpose to make an attack down the river, even though Grant should go ahead on the overland he had adopted overland, that general called Sherman into his councils, and the result was that Sherman and not Grant became the leader in the formidable attack upon the fortifications of Vicksburg.

After considerable telegraphing with Washington, Grant was ordered to have 20,000 troops at Memphis for an attack down the river. A large part of these troops was to be new regiments, and it was known that General J. A. McClernand, then stationed in Illinois, was raising men for the purpose of an expedition down the river. McClernand was of higher rank than Sherman and had authority from the president and secretary of war to command the river expedition independent of Grant. In order to forestall McClernand, Grant, who finally got authority to either lead the troops he was to send with the expedition down the river in person or appoint another to the task, chose Sherman. Sherman's instructions were to take one of his own divisions and the troops of General S. H. Carter, then at Memphis, and proceed at once down the Mississippi and, with the aid of Porter's fleet of gunboats, reduce the Confederate fortress. It was understood between Grant and Sherman that, in case Pemberton refused to stand for battle against Grant's column and marched back to Vicksburg to checkmate Sherman, Grant would follow close on his heels and get into position to attack the Confederate rear while Sherman engaged on the front.

Confederates Prepare to Fight Grant

It was expected that Pemberton would look first to the safety of Vicksburg, for that was the problem set before him. Sherman's force was insufficient as compared with all that Pemberton could marshal against him if he chose to ignore Grant. But if Grant could keep Pemberton away from Vicksburg the task would be easy, for the actualarrison of the Vicksburg fortress at the time was only about 10,000 men.

CHAPTER VII. The Wilderness Road.

HE stopped and stared at her in astonishment. "Katherine!
What are you doing here?"
"Listening to the speeches of course. I wanted dad to come along but he said no. His interest in politics was practical, not sentimental, and he preferred to take his vaudeville straight. He was in quite a bad humor because I wanted to come. This —I am here."

"I wish you hadn't come," he said
still in a daze.
"That's kind, I'm sure," she teased her head in burlesque ballet. "Instead, you might offer to drive home with me. Williams can stay here and drive back when you return."

He shook his head. "I'd better not," he muttered. "He still wanted to go away by himself to think."
"Please!" She leaned forward and urged him softly. "It's our last chance for a good chat. We go away tomorrow morning."

He tried honestly to resist, but instinctively she spelled danger and that every hour with her added to the danger. But he made the mistake of looking at her. Always she was so radiant, so full of life, so full of despite his inner warnings, now he saw a sort of recklessness. He caught himself a weakening, a feel that playing with fire. And, so, stilling himself as possible. Soon they had left the town behind them and were howling about the midnight road.

John, letting the rattle and the boom of the present drift into the back ground, gave himself up to a reckless enjoyment of the hour. The white splendor of the moon, unclouded by smoky torches, the silent majesty of the hills with their shadows and silver sheen, alone were real. The crowd of faces peering intently at him through the half gloom, the struggle within him as he stood before them, his from rejection of the part assigned him seemed unreal, creatures of a fantastic dream. And the girl beside him, like him, silent into silence, was real, very real.

"It seems," she said, "that I must always take the aggressive. But then you never hunt me out—so what can I do? I suppose most people would call me unwomanly. Do you think so that?"
"I do not," he answered unthinkingly.
"You can't expect the beneficiary to be critical."

"Do you mean that, I wonder? It is only your nice way of letting me down easily? But I am not contenting I am seeking. A—a friendship, such as ours, means a great deal to me.
Her voice died away into silence.
He was hard put to it to keep a tight grip on himself, to hold down the longing surge within him. Instinctively he tried to think of her as she was, an unformed woman of essential softness, of generous impulses. He had not yet found the solution to the problem presented to him by his campaign, but he felt blindly that it was leading him into paths whether she would not follow, into which he, if he yielded to his hunger, would not—could not—go alone. He had sometimes thought he felt in her that which would carry her to great heights; yet he knew she was now of the earth, earthy. She was a creature of luxury. He thought of his last year's income and laughed im-pleasantly.

"Why this sudden hilarity?" she demanded.
"It's a joke I've just thought of—you wouldn't appreciate it."

"Was it," she pressed him—"was it about your speech tonight?"

"Indirectly, I suppose," he replied.
"Will you tell me about that? It was the reason—one reason—why I wanted you to come home with me. I'm of two minds about it. Of course, I didn't understand what it was all about, except that you were expected to say far more and something different. Anyone could see that the men on the platform were angry. But one had the feeling that somehow you were finding and asserting yourself—doing something rather splendid. I know it made Aunt Roberta begin to snuffle—she said it was a cold in her head. I heard one man near us—a big, hulking farmer say, 'My Joshua! I always thought there was considerable of a man under that white skin of Johnny Dumme-de's.' He didn't mean to be funny.
I think. Another, a different sort of man, laughed and said, 'Now that's the cleverest move yet. It's a grand stand play, but it'll runke him if he lives long enough to follow it up. It'll give him a following.'"

She looked up at him inquiringly.
He saw now the eager interest in her eyes.

"It was neither splendid nor crafty," he said grimly. "I was expected to rant and blather about the virtues of candidates I've no faith in, cover up a horrible lot of things that, it seems, can't be said."

answered. I had that speech ready. I wish now that I could. But then perhaps that is only because it is—now.
Perhaps tomorrow, when I weigh you against the things I have and want, I shall find you lacking."

He made no reply. He, too, was wondering. Could she make herself over? Could he make her over? He stood awkwardly before her for a moment, then turned as though to leave.

"Are you going to relinquish me wholly?" Her voice was still steady, but in the moonlight her face was very white. "Don't! I—this summer tonight—you have nuzzled in me longings for something different. Perhaps
I may yet become big enough to be happy with what you can give me
with you."

He was trembling. He had to shut himself again before he could reply.
"I can't let myself hope that you will come. But if you come, it must be without persuasion from me."

She went a few steps up the stairs
toward the terrace. Then she stopped and faced him again. "Goodbye. Adieu."

It was trembling. He had to shut himself again before he could reply.
"I can't let myself hope that you will come. But if you come, it must be without persuasion from me."

She went a few steps up the stairs
toward the terrace. Then she stopped and faced him again. "Goodbye. Adieu."

But he merely smiled bitterly. "And I suspect that by the time I'd got the power in the fashion you describe, I'd have become the sort of man that doesn't use his power for good."

"What are you going to do about it?"
"About the election?" He shrugged his shoulders in indifference. "I've been here, I suppose. I haven't thought ahead as far as tomorrow."

"Now that it's all over I can admit your refusing to make that speech. It was splendid in a way. You see, I can appreciate usefulness in the abstract or when it can't be remedied."

"I told you that wasn't myself," he insisted. "But I can add to the evidence—your kindly, even if mistaken, interest in me and my future. And you mustn't sneer at yourself," he added gravely.

She turned to look fairly into his eyes. "Do you still think it necessary to let me down easily?" she asked quietly.

His body became rigid, nails biting into palms in the effort not to take her in his arms. For, without reasoning, he knew that to accept now what she unasked had offered would be to place himself in her power. And that he dared not! For a long moment their eyes clung, then at the same instant they both looked hastily away.

The silent minutes lengthened as the cold glow then slowly up the face of Dummeade. Behind them lay the carpet, always beautiful, never so wonderful as in the pallor of night; but they looked steadfastly ahead.

"To his credit he'd written John not to think capriciously of her boldness, let us use the word he used, courage.
His longing was not lessened because she had abandoned the woman's wear on of tenderness for the man's frankness. Yet his heart on himself did relax—it became even the more so. And he wondered at the strength now revealed within him, able to resist the temptation of her. He knew all that she was, and he knew, too, that he desired, would always desire, her above all good things that life holds, yet between them stood an ideal that was without essential to him. And he believed that he had strength to put her—the temptation—away from him."

He put aside his self measuring.
From what? What was he to do that made impossible the taking of this girl by his side, his to take?

He had said in answer to her question, "I don't know." Let them both I suppose. He suddenly knew that was not true. He must make his fight.
A warm glow enveloped him, his blood quickened. He spoke aloud.

"I will fight them."
She turned to look at him again.
"You have thought as far ahead as tomorrow," she said steadily.

"Further than that?"
When he had helped her to alight at her home both her hands were in his.
He did not release them, nor did he seek to disturb his clasp. She met his gaze unflinchingly.

"Listen," he said gently. "I didn't know that you cared. I, too, care—far more than you will believe."

"I know you care," she answered simply. "And why you won't take me?"

"I have known it ever since our ride," he went on. "That is why I have not seen you since, and a poor man cannot the right to do more than ask a man used to luxury to share his life. He must not try to persuade. And he has not the right to ask any woman, unless she can sympathize with him, help him in his work. If she couldn't, it would bring her unhappiness and destroy his work. You—I—we are in sympathy. And a man's work, to place in life, must come first."

"If I could only be sure of myself," she cried. "You are so many things that I care for and you refuse to take —so many things that I care for."

"The things that you care for can be had only at the expense of the things that are—that I hope are indispensable to me. I don't mean to be prigish."

"You aren't prigish," she answered quickly. Then she went on: "I wonder, can one make oneself over? I wish now that I could. But then perhaps that is only because it is—now.

Perhaps tomorrow, when I weigh you
against the things I have and want, I shall find you lacking."

He made no reply. He, too, was wondering. Could she make herself
over? Could he make her over? He stood awkwardly before her for a moment, then turned as though to leave.

"Are you going to relinquish me wholly?" Her voice was still steady,
but in the moonlight her face was very white. "Don't! I—this summer
tonight—you have nuzzled in me longings for something different. Perhaps
I may yet become big enough to be happy with what you can give me
with you."

He was trembling. He had to shut himself again before he could reply.
"I can't let myself hope that you will come. But if you come, it must be without persuasion from me."

She went a few steps up the stairs
toward the terrace. Then she stopped and faced him again. "Goodbye. Adieu."

"Thank you for not humiliating me," thank you for not humiliating me, for saying that you cared." She said it without a quiver.

"Goodbye." He got into the trap and drove away without once looking back.
"John, John!" she whispered. "Why didn't you take me—myself—of my self?" Then she went into the house.

In the hall she found her father reading. He looked at her sharply.
"You look alone up. It was a long errand. What's Williams driving out again for?"

"It wasn't Williams," she answered.
"John Dummeade came home with me."
"Humph!" he growled. "You'll be making a fool of yourself over that fellow yet if you're not careful."
"No, I won't," she said wearily. "He won't let me. He doesn't want me. I clutched myself to him and he virtually told me I am a selfish pig."

"But it's a good thing we're going away tomorrow. You go upstairs to bed. And when you say your prayers thank the Lord that I've brought you up to be what you are and that you aren't going to be the wife of a one-horse country lawyer."

CHAPTER VIII. Across the Border.

THE next morning at the breakfast table Judge Dummeade sat in a high but elegant silence. John began, hesitantly, "Father, last night—"
"It is too late for regrets, she"
"I am not exactly regretting. But I felt an explanation—"

"John," the judge interrupted coldly, "explain away the fact that you have betrayed the party that honored you, most discredibly upon William Marchell, who has given you his friendship, upon me, who—can you explain that?" He rose.

John shook his head. "I thought I could. But now, I'm afraid not."
The judge's lips parted, then closed firmly as though he could not trust himself to speak. He raised his hand in a gesture in which grief and hopelessness were blended and, turning starkly slowly from the room.

John smiled uncertainly. "I was afraid Aunt Roberta, your home were a true prophet."

She steeled herself. He went out to face his neighbors—his ordeal. New Chelsea was rent in twain now, into many divisions—by John's speech, its honest but partisan son sorely troubled.

"The largest number, torn betwixt liking for their young neighbor and the mental discomfort of those whose traditions had been rudely jolted, with held judgment until they could see what befell. Among the farmers was no discussion. A sudden lifting of heads, a still half-unbelieving re-belling, the young fellow, who as he sweat with them in the fields asked questions had dared to rebel that protest."

The G. O. P., staunchly partisan, made no mention of John's part in the rally save the unconsciously humorous sentence, "Attorney John Dummeade also spoke."

Later, not greatly mollified by the doubtful honor of being a done of contention, John was alone in his office smoking furiously, brow wrinkled, feet propped on the table. A heavy tread in the outer room announced the arrival of a visitor. Without knocking the newcomer threw open the door and strode into the office. His hat was Without invitation Sheehan sat down.

John considered this statement for a

"For your position a great deal; for

Why we should not expect these results to be duplicated or exceeded under our system.

"My personal experience has satisfied me that we may expect such results under our probation law. Prior to its enactment I often suspended sentence, continuing the case from term to term until satisfied that a nominal fine would be sufficient punishment. Since the law became operative, I make use of it in about one-fourth of the cases, whether pleading guilty or convicted by a jury, in all about 100 cases. Of this number, probably not to exceed 5 per cent have I have been obliged to call in and commit to prison. I have applied the law to nearly all offenses, and to the old as well as the young, and to second and third offenders, as well as first. Although I may have extended the letter of the law, the results justified the act. Every case must be determined upon the facts it presents. The offender is always restrained of his liberty to some extent. A boundary line is established beyond which he cannot pass. It may be a city block, or the city, township, county or state limits. He cannot communicate with prohibited persons. He must make frequent reports of his conduct, attend his receipt and expenses, both of which are under the direction and control of the court. If married, he must support his family; if unmarried, he must accumulate a bank account, pay his debts, abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors, and work regularly at such employment as he can obtain. If necessary, the probation officer will aid him in securing a job, and collect his pay when so ordered. When practicable, he must repair the wrong done. Being satisfied that he may safely be intrusted with his liberty, he is discharged, and usually such sum is assessed and collected as will reimburse the taxpayers, in whole if possible, if not, at least in part. Probation is punishment, legal imprisonment, and at any time, if circumstances demand, may be changed to actual imprisonment.

"The indeterminate sentence law and the probation law can only reach and aid in dealing with criminals who are or who approach the normal. When the normal man turns criminal, his lapse may generally be traced to his environment, and probation will usually, by changing his environment, furnish a remedy. Not so with the degenerate when he becomes a criminal. His natural condition being abnormal, he does not fit into normal conditions and becomes a criminal. To the degree that the offender departs from the normal does the remedy offered by these laws fail. The danger arising from additions to the degenerate class is an increasing rather than a decreasing one. Adequate steps to protect society from the threatened peril must be soon taken, the sooner the better.

"Any further reduction in the population of our penal institutions, asylums, etc., must come by the application of some remedy to be hereafter supplied. The entire question of how to protect society from degeneracy resulting in poverty, insanity and vice, I would refer to a commission to be appointed by the governor to report at the coming session of the legislature. In this I would include the allied question of marriage and divorce. While the time would be short in which to prepare and submit a report with recommendations, yet we may have many men who have given this subject such consideration that the time intervening would be adequate. Other states have been working upon this problem and the results of their efforts can be readily ascertained. Indiana is trying a remedy by advanced lines. The results should be observed. Other states have adopted her system. Might not we?"

A Wartime New Year's Day Experience

ON New Year's morning, 1903, when the thermometer was below zero, probably the most undisciplined body of troops in the whole Union army marched into camp at Martinsburg, W. Va. The men looked careless, fatigued, sleepy and cold. Some of them were bareheaded, which showed that they had traveled day and night and had fallen asleep on their horses. Many had lost their hats and caps by their heads coming in contact with the limbs of the trees in the woods. Some had the front and back parts burned out of their overcoats and trousers, which had probably happened while they were dozing before the fire. A few of them wore some Confederate clothing, indicating apparently that they had captured some Confederate quartermaster's stores and had replaced their own damaged garments with their enemy's clothing. Others had their feet tied up with pieces of blankets and sheepskins.

Many of the men were dismounted, others were mounted on wagon horses and mules, with the harness still on the animals. This showed that the wagon train had been destroyed and that some of the men, who had lost their cavalry horses, had mounted these animals.

The infantry and the citizens of Martinsburg gathered around and stared at these troops in wonder. This was General Averell's command, four regiments of cavalry and a battery that had just returned from the Salem raid. The raiding party left New Creek (now Keyser City, W. Va.), Dec. 8, 1863, marched to Salem, Va., thence back to Martinsburg, W. Va., arriving there Jan. 1, 1864, traveling twenty-four days. During this time the party traveled several hundred miles, tore up the Virginia and Tennessee railroad tracks to prevent General Lee from reinforcing General Burnside at Knoxville, Tenn. At Salem the Confederate quartermaster and commissary stores were destroyed.

On our retreat a dozen or more Confederate brigades were after us and tried to head us off at every crossroad. At Covington, Va., after the bridge over Jackson river was burned, our regiment, the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, which was the rear guard, and a few dismounted men of other regiments that were with the wagon train were surrounded on the south side of the river. One of the Confederate generals sent in a flag of truce, demanding a surrender, but we fought our way through. After we burned our wagon train we swam the Jackson river.

On our retreat we traveled through a severe snowstorm and slid down the mountains. Our artillery was saved by pulling it over the mountains with ropes.

Our brigade lost on this raid killed, drowned, frozen and captured, men and live officers.

A few men were so badly frozen that they died shortly afterward.

Thus on that New Year's morning we were cold, hungry, tired, sleepy, dirty and shabby. These men soon heard of our condition and came to us with outstretched arms, for on Jan. 10 he presented every one of us with a brand new outfit, which included overcoat, dress coat, blouse, hat, cap, shirt, drawers, stockings, boots and blankets. We soon commenced to get converted, for we believed that we were the only brigade in the whole Union army that had ever received such a magnificent gift from the United States government.—James F. Hays in Baltimore American.

The New Year.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.
Ring out the old; ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go,
Ring out the false; ring in the true.
Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more;
Ring out the feud of rich and poor;
Ring in redress to all mankind.
Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless unbelief of the times;
Ring out, ring out, my mournful times,
But ring the fuller jubilee in.
Ring out false pride to place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right;
Ring in the common love of good.
Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old;
Ring in the thousand years of peace.
Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring in the Christ that is to be,

THE NEED FOR GOOD ROADS

Poor Highways Draining Country's Funds.

HOW TO GET MONEY FOR ROADS

There Are Four Methods of Getting Work Done, Gift, Direct Taxation, Bonds and Convict Labor—Transportation Loss is Enormous Yearly.

Few people know what a modern highway is. Our government has no conception of its economic value. To talk good roads is to bore most people. The relation between roads, water ways and railways is not understood. Says Samuel Hill in Good Roads:

Article 8 of the constitution of the United States, which provides for the establishment of postoffices and post roads, is so far as it relates to roads, a dead letter. For nearly 100 years no public movement has ever been undertaken for the establishment of highways. Local communities here and there have struggled for betterment of highways and against existing political methods which render their construction impossible.

In dollars and cents the loss by bad primary transportation over the so-called highways of America to the producers and the consumers every year from marketing their products over these roads runs into figures which few minds can comprehend.

The United States leads the world in economic stunts transportation, the average cost to the public being approximately three-quarters of a cent for hauling a ton one mile over the steam railways. It is not far from the truth to say that the American farmer is at a disadvantage against his European competitor to the extent of paying an excess of twenty cents per ton per mile over the so-called roads in America.

The same followers and organized parasites, preying on the good roads movement, have run the cost of permanent roads up so high as to frighten people attempting to build permanent highways. The public has overlooked the fact that highways are the property of the people; that to build good highways requires centralized power and a proper standardization. The people must to benefit by good roads must oppose them.

The change necessitated in the character of the highways through the use of the modern self-propelled vehicle makes it possible for the United States to equip itself with modern highways at a cost no greater than the cost abroad.

I know of only four ways of receiving money to form a fund from which roads can be built.

The first is by gift of money or services.

The second way in which a community can receive money for road building is by direct taxation, but unless the sums so spent are economically used, road building must of necessity be slow.

The third way is by the issuance of bonds, placing the burden for permanent roads, in part at least, on future generations.

The fourth way is by utilizing an asset which unfortunately all the states have, and that is by building roads with convict labor. I am heartily in favor of this method, and have advocated it for many years. Labor so employed interferes in no way with free labor and is of great advantage from a humanitarian standpoint in that while roads are being built by convicts, the character of men is being reformed and their bodies are being strengthened by proper manual labor. The facts are, in Washington, that better results can be obtained by the utilization of convict labor than by hiring men to perform the work. There is no reason why a man, whether rich or poor, should be supported in idleness, and the burden of any man supported in idleness must be borne by the work ers. The work should not be limited to men convicted of crime, but proper detention camps should be established so that those men prone to idleness and vagrancy could be sent direct from the courtroom to the detention camp and compelled to earn their keep and relieve society of the burden of their support.

NOW UP TO THE SENATE

To Prevent the Interstate Shipment of Booze Into Dry Counties.

Prohibition Forces United for Passage of Kenyon-Shepard Bill.

After years campaigning throughout the country, and frequent vain efforts made in congress, prohibition forces have their united strength at Washington for the passage of the Kenyon-Shepard bill calculated to prevent interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors across the line in states which have prohibitory laws. As the Shepard bill it passed the lower house and is now up to the senate, it certain amendments are attached to it and it is passed, as friends of the bill predict it will be, it will have to go back to the house for further approval before President Taft is asked for his signature.

That the struggle is full of meaning is indicated by the cry of alarm sent out by such journals as Bon-forts Wine and Spirit Gazette, which declared that the passage of the bill would be the greatest victory ever won by the Anti-Saloon league; this cannot mean anything else than that great quantities of liquor are now being shipped from license to non-license territory.

Logically the measure seems perfectly reasonable in aim. It provides that the federal government shall not lend its aid indirectly to the violation of a state law, or hamper any state in the enforcement of its own laws. Practically the federal government, while remorseless in punishing those moonshiners and bootleggers who seek to evade payment of the federal liquor tax, has always confined itself in its activities to executing the original intent of federal liquor tax laws when the tax is paid the government assumes it has nothing more to do. It "minds its own business" within the states. Hence it must pursue without local aid the violators of federal law, which local officers cannot ask even for information as to the law violators from federal revenue officials.

Organize for THE BIG ROAD

Chicago to Mackinaw Automobile Road Along Lake Michigan.

Meeting held at Big Rapids Shows Prospects are Good for its Completion.

An important meeting was held at Big Rapids Wednesday of last week to promote the building of the proposed automobile route from Chicago to Mackinaw. About forty representatives of the counties north of Grand Rapids attended and much enthusiasm was awakened over the project.

Reports were received indicating that the good roads have been built for the route continuous from Cadillac to Mackinaw. From Reed City to Cadillac, a distance of about twenty miles, the roads are not good. From Grand Rapids to Reed City the road is mostly good, but there are some bad spots. It was decided to organize in every county along the route from the Indian state line to the straits and meetings will be held to promote the movement. The plan is to have county committees, with chairman and two members in each county and then local committees of chairman and two or more members in every township through which the route extends. The county chairmen will be the executive committee for the general organization. From the expressions at Big Rapids it is believed the route will be realized next season with good roads the entire distance.

UNKNOWN CHRISTMASSES OF WELL KNOWN MEN

By A. B. WILLIAMS

I AM a grown man, yet the 25th of December is always associated with my small boyhood, with frothy Christmases and Uncle Toby's notebook.

Please do not imagine that notebook as a red leathered affair encased in holly sprays, for it was merely a note in my uncle's mind where he kept fresh indeed as a holly sprig, his memories and records. "Oh, yes, my boy, I knew Grant," he informed me, as we were passing the then newly erected tomb and when Uncle Toby's sunshine were giving even to that edifice a holiday aspect.

"I received a Christmas present from him long ago."

"Smoked meat's much as you do, didn't he, uncle?" I queried in cautious tones.

"Yes," with slight glance into the past; "he was smoking then, when he, with three others of us, was parched with thirst down in war-ridden Mexico. Two others and myself asked a third of the precious liquid. My brain must have been partially clouded by the sip of water, for I suddenly accused General Grant of having had none.

"I didn't lie," he answered, a little impatiently, between puffs from his pipe. "I did drink a cupful of water, but not this month. I drank it from our own Potomac. Let's see—when were we in that land that God made called America?"

A year passed. As a white, fluffy storm was raging without I was perched upon Uncle Toby's knee before an old fashioned burning Yule log. What is the something come from modern Christmas fires? I was staring too fashion at Uncle Toby's whiskered cracked grin as he in turn stared at a fiercer, more glaring, sleep-eyed, the friskiness of her kitten.

"Makes me think of Martha Washington's cat," mused my uncle, tut-tutting his animal story like a couplet. And just here perhaps you will notice that those tales of Uncle Toby's were not given in chronological order and were limited to Christmas day.

"Did Martha Washington?"

"My unfinished sentence meant, for the consort of our great George, living at stately Mount Vernon, hand with brocade and powdered, jeweled hand to pet a mouse cat."

"Indeed she did," answered the story teller and comfortably stretching a knee. "What appeared to be a minute tiger was one day presented to her, a wild little creature that seemed perched upon colonial chairs by day, but that patted with soft little paw the great dame's cheek toward evening. As the kitten grew older it showed marked intelligence. Lady Washington asserted that it knew when she was ill or depressed. Its animal magnetism could draw a pain from her shoulder, while its instinctive sympathy could convey a pain from her heart. General Washington's enforced absence from home, for example."

"Several months later found Martha Washington inconsolable. The general was gone campaigning, and Lady Tige the cat was gone—where?"

"Christmas morning dawned upon the Potomac and stole in among the bare shivering trees of the Mount Vernon estate. As it entered Lady Washington's oak paneled room she felt a soft touch upon the cheek. Drowsily she opened her eyes to see Lady Tige with its Christmas gift in its mouth. Gently a cunning little kitten was dropped upon Martha's neck. A few believe that the Lady Tiger purred: "If George Washington is to be the Father of his Country, I want you to please become a second mother to my kitten."

The next Christmas I was a year older—the realization did not make me growl then—authentically old, in fact, to demand "a experience" with Uncle Toby as one of the characters.

"I want you in this one," I insisted. Chimes were pealing, and Uncle Toby was really looking very queer, for he loyally wore a smoking jacket and at the same time loyally smoked a cigar both selected by an absent and only sister.

"I have always felt proud that I was in that story," commenced my uncle, "and at that house party. Your uncle used to dress to kill my boy."

ably looking conscious, Uncle Toby glanced intently at the smoking jacket. "Well, of course," he hesitated with the dear, cracked smile—"we dressed differently then. Every man of us in the house party was in two with a girl, and every girl pretended that she was in love with one of the men. The big rooms and halls were hung with holly and with mistletoe. There were games, and there was laughter. But toward Christmas eve the hostess's sweet daughter appeared dismayed. She had learned that her brother, returning for Christmas, would bring a friend. I repeat we were a pair of off, as the saying was, and the girls didn't suit the boys. The newcomer would probably throw a damper—would certainly be unwelcome. He came, my boy! Oh, the wonderful light that twinkled in those eyes, the unsmiling mouth from which issued such sympathy with the case in apparent innocence with which the brother's claim cut out every portion of us! He was the grave humorist Artemus Ward."

"THE CHRISTMAS STAR," ANSWERED LINDA.

My Uncle Toby for many reasons grew many years older during the one following year. Upon his Christmas morning I stood howling in rage with a half smothered by tilted stocking thrown upon the floor. I had much childhood's great discovery—there was no Santa Claus! My uncle wisely me cry in, first bitterness away. Then with a suspicion of the old snuff, he watched me kick the stocking into the grate and buried wooden prehistoric anvil beneath the ashes. I looked in definitely, expecting to meet stern disapproval in his glance. Instead I saw a troubled face full of a wistful tender loss.

"Come here, little man! There was once a grand president, as well as a forceful man, who in his first real year had been foraging for just a swallow of water. Neither food nor wine could longer refresh either the general or ourselves. How dusty and warm the half withered red poppies looked growing in front of General Grant's tent. Well, returning unsuccessful, our head or greeted us with a flask containing water!

"Here, boys, I saved a third of share for each of you. I've just drunk a cupful. Tommy got it at great risk."

"Surprised by the greed of our hero suddenly we each augmented from the row, mottled up, out down, at the bushes. Shall I tell you about him?"

"Yes," in catching unconcealatory breaths.

"It seemed that the president's name stood for all that was heroic. Now that I fully understand I can't about for a worthy adjective with which to describe him, but do not add it. The best tribute I decide is simply to write his name."

"Abraham Lincoln was already well known, brilliant, necessary, when the hidden part of him, the sentiment, the imagination, came to the sudden view of an intimate."

"This favored friend toward the end of a mild Christmas afternoon sought Lincoln to consult him politically. It was not at home, and the friend, following a spoken trail of 'I saw him there,' I watched him turn you der, finally left the townships and crossed country. At dusk, near a row of trees, his large bright nostrils, by the head's uplift, Abraham Lincoln walked reverently."

"What, what are you following the friend asked softly."

"The Christmas star," answered I, with a strong, sweet gravity.

"And what do you see in a star?"

"And, her eyes all shining, sending me Christmas cheer and long due to meet with courage what the new year sends."

"Thank Toby," I asked, impressed by a tale so simply told that even a child could understand. "Have you telling me the truth?" A boy's eyes, unless he is to have a future, are usually honest. My uncle hesitated. I persisted.

"Was there, there Lincoln, was there Grant, the other?"

"Thank God and Uncle Sam!" was the fervent reply. "There were and always shall be Grant, Lincoln and the others."

A Historic Christmas

CHRISTMAS night, 1776. General George Washington crossed the Delaware, and the next day occurred the battle of Trenton. The Hessians were naturally surprised. They took it for granted that the Revolution army would rest upon Christmas eve and permit them to enjoy their Christmas in peace, but Washington concluded that the Hessians would be better off if they were not.

On the day, and he loaded his small army on boats and crossed the icy waters of the muddy river. He reckoned correctly, and the result of his daring maneuver was that he attacked Colonel Rahl at sunrise. The commanding officer and twenty of the enemy were killed and 1,000 taken prisoners. Two Americans were killed and two were frozen to death. Washington's valor, however, saved the American cause.

Storing Christmas Presents

Flat dwellers in the big cities have not the same facilities for storing their Christmas packages that people enjoy who live in houses. It is very hard to conceal an intended present in a flat. For that reason drug stores, food shops, stationers and other like places are used. If one does his Christmas shopping early and does not wish to appear with the gift at his home before Christmas eve he employs some of those hiding places where the prying eyes of wife or children may not discover in advance the nature of the intended surprise.

Christmas Trees and Fires

So many fires have been started by candles on Christmas trees that in many states laws have been passed against this form of illumination. In those states where the practice still prevails a hose or bucket of water should be kept handy to put out any blaze that may start. A very effective substitute for the candles is furnished by a system of tiny electric bulbs connected with a few small storage batteries. As these bulbs may be used year after year the expense is not high.

Christmas Deceptions

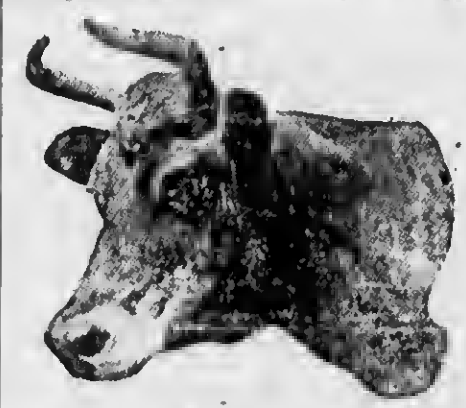

In one sense Christmas is a sort of game which the grown ups play with as much zest as the children. Santa Claus is not the only deception. Everybody pretends to enjoy buying presents and to be delighted with those received from others. Yet these little white lies are available and are forgiven, let us be sure, because of the spirit behind them. Besides, it is just such innocent pretending that makes social life possible and that keeps the heart young.

An Egyptian New Year's Greeting

The following from Maspero's Guide to the Cairo Museum of Antiquities is of the true interest, showing how the celebration was blended with New Year's celebration in ancient Egypt:

"The Egyptians worshipped the sun from the most remote antiquity, for it seems that in the beginning it was considered as being one of the shapes of the god itself. So the image of it was multiplied in order to assure to living and dead alike a continuance of being, and, like all religious emblems, held a general esteem. It was used as a sort of ornamentation in jewelry. Scarabaei were set as rings, seals or pendants on those who wore them thus having not only an amulet, but an ornament, and were made of every size and made in every shape. A whole class of scarabaei bore good wishes for the New Year—'May Amon, Isis or Bastet, or Ra give thee a happy beginning of the year.' Others wished him to be provided with the pure of life, or with life itself."

Farm Dairying

XI.—Churns and Other Dairy Apparatus.

By LAURA ROSE, Demonstrator and Lecturer in Dairying at the Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, Canada.

IT is possible a building, or at least a room, should be fitted up and used exclusively for dairy work. It should be well lighted, well ventilated, convenient and easy to clean. It should be well supplied with pure cold water and should have a good drain. One great trouble among our farm homes is the lack of a proper sewerage system, causing very unsanitary conditions. This means that the cream and health may be lost by installing a septic tank or other device at a cost of about $25.

Provision should be made for heating the dairy in winter and, by choice, location and shade trees, having it cool as possible in summer.

I have used many different kinds of churns, but so far have found no so satisfactory as the plain turned style revolving and a cover and having dashers or breakers inside. The earthy, curdled, curdled churns have been recommended.

Large Size Churn Recommended. In buying a churn be sure to get a large size. It is better to have a churn that will hold more than one that will hold less. It has a churning capacity of from two to seven gallons, though I prefer not putting over five in it. Multiply the usual number of gallons of cream you have by three, and it will give you the capacity of a churn you should get. To do a good work it is best to have the churn one-third full.

Get a churn with a strong stand and the upright bars well braced. It should be convenient to get a pull made to draw off the bottom milk, etc. The pull hole should be nearly level with the bottom of the churn as possible. The lid should be large, the fastenings convenient and safe and the slight gress on the lid large.

There should be two means of making the churn revolve, or, rather, it should be so that two persons may work at it together. I have a preference for the overhead bar.

Leave the plug out and the lid ajar and keep in a cool place to prevent warping.

The worker, spades and butter printer may be prepared just before needed. With a fiber brush, a dipper of hot water and a little salt give them a good scouring and cool well with cold water. Using the brush and the salt fills the pores of the wood more readily with water and prevents the butter sticking to it. The brush and salt dislodge the food of a large quantity of hot and cold water. The salt also cleanses.

After using the utensils remove any butter with hot water. Again scour with salt, rinse with hot water and allow them to dry. While only the varnished part of the worker, it is best to have spades of cotton to throw over the churn and worker when not in use.

Line is used freely in Finnish creameries and dairies to clean and sweeten wooden utensils and is gaining favor in this country. After scrubbing the utensils with hot water, while the wood is yet warm, cover the surface with a thick lime wash and let them stand for several days. This wash will be hot to be recommended every time of using, as it hardens the wood and makes it smooth.

Applied in the same way, lime is no superior for removing oil or grease from floor. If the churn be washed occasionally with lime water it will keep it from getting an offensive smell.

While collecting sufficient cream for churning it is best held in a good tin can or, for a small amount, a nice enameled pail. A can is better than a crock. It is very handy to have two cream cans.

Keep Cream Can Covered.

The cream can should stand in the coolest place in the dairy or cellar or in a tank of cold water in summer. In winter it may be kept in a room where the temperature ranges from 50 to 60 degrees. The surrounding atmosphere should be clean and sweet. The can must always be covered, not necessarily air tight.

Have a long handled ladle or a strainer, which reaches to the bottom of the can, and stir the cream thoroughly, right from the bottom to the top, each time fresh cream is added. The stirring motion should not be round and round, but up and down.

When cream is ripened at a high temperature or held for too long a time there is apt to be an excess of acid, giving an old cream flavor to the butter. Always err on having the little rather than too much acid.

No fresh cream should be added within eight or ten hours of churning, and it is well to have the cream at churning temperature, preferably below 60, for several hours previous to churning. This applies to sweet cream as well as to the sour.

When beginning to collect cream for churning, it is best to be ripened, add to your first skimming a culture which you know has a clean, pleasant mold flavor and smell.

This culture may consist of a cup or two of the sour cream on hand for churning or the same amount of good flavored sour skim milk. I do not advise the use of buttermilk as a culture. I prefer the sour cream. The object in adding culture is that the bacteria which you know produce a fine flavored butter may take possession of the new cream before other germs, which might prove objectionable, can control it.

Cream From Shallow Pans.

Cream from shallow pans usually has enough acid without any culture being added, but butter made from it is not of such a uniform flavor.

Cream from the deep setting cans, owing to its being held all the time at a low temperature and thus checking bacterial growth, produces butter of the flavor and good texture. It may be necessary in winter to heat the cream from deep cans to 55 or 60 degrees before adding it to the cream can in order to develop sufficient acid by the time a churning is collected.

Separator cream should have the form well stirred in. Separator cream must be quickly and thoroughly cooled by being placed in cold water and frequently stirred, so as to quickly bring it to 55 or 60 degrees in winter and from 50 to 55 degrees in summer. Under no conditions should the warm separator cream be added to the cream can.

Cream ready for churning should have a cream position, slightly sour taste and smell, should be of the consistency of molasses and when poured from one can to another should show from 2 to 2.5 per cent and from 2.5 to 2.8 per cent of acid in a butter. A cream of 2.5 per cent of acid is about three parts of butter to one part of whey.

The title butter was a cream very honorable, and the oil was used with dairy butter for weeks.

FEW CHANGES IN OFFICIALS

Judge of Probate Harris will be Succeeded by S. A. Correll.

AFTER TWELVE YEARS SERVICE

Treasurer Lewis and County Clerk Payton will Change Their Offices.

Interesting Statistics Showing Work in Clerk's Office During the Past Four Years—Work of all Officers has Increased.

The first of the year will see few changes at the court house. Upstairs Sheriff Robbins will enter upon another term and will be assisted by the same efficient corps of deputies that made his administration so successful during the past two years, in preserving the peace of the county.

Judge Harris, who for the past 12 years has presided over the probate court, to the entire satisfaction of the people of the county, will be succeeded by S. A. Correll, who has long served the people as supervisor of Melrose township, gaining the reputation of being a careful economical official, which is evidence of a successful career in the higher position. During Judge Harris' incumbency of this position the work of the office has increased, owing to the natural growth of the county and the addition of the juvenile court work, until the judge has been compelled during the past few years to devote a portion of his time, both at Boyne City and East Jordan, to the work of the court. It is the intention of Judge Correll to devote all of his time to the work of the office.

Down stairs Register of Deeds Eurey will be found busily engaged in giving up to the minute service, although the work of the office has been increased by the development work in this section. Mr. Eurey will continue to be assisted by his daughters, the Misses Ruth and Marian.

County Treasurer Lewis will be succeeded by Daniel S. Payton, who will bring to the office the experience of his four years' previous service. In this office too the work has increased not only naturally but by the addition of the mortgage tax law and other enactments until the time is not far distant when an assistant will be necessary.

When Mr. Payton leaves the clerk's office Mr. Lewis will take his place at the clerk's desk, where he previously presided to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. This office comes more nearly the people than any other as a record has to be filed of every transaction in life from birth until death in this office. Mr. Payton has kindly furnished us with some interesting statistics of the work during his four years' incumbency. Here too, the legislature has increased the work by multiplying the number of elections and registration of different professions. The adoption of the county road system also makes more work for the clerk.

The statistics follows:
Number of births recorded 1788.
Number of deaths recorded 1020.
Number of marriage licenses recorded 760.

Number of notary public commissions delivered 93.
Number of petitions for naturalization filed 87.
Number of petitions naturalized 67.

Number of petitioners denied citizenship 6.
Number admitted to citizenship and later order of admission cancelled 1.
Number filing declaration of intention to become citizens 71.
Number of complaints for divorce filed 178.
Number for divorce decrees recorded 122.

Below is given some figures in regard to the work of the circuit court besides the divorce record above:
Number of civil suits entered 183.
Number of criminal suits entered 91.
Number of criminals sent to state prison 7.
Number of criminals sent to Detroit House of Correction 11.

Number of criminals paying fines 15.

Number of criminals estraining bail 5.

Number of criminals placed on probation 31.

Number of criminals violating terms of parole. None.

During the same period of time there has been 13 sessions of the board of supervisors and eight elections.

Notwithstanding this volume of work, which has always been kept up to date, Mr. Payton has found time to handle for the county, as a director of the Western Michigan Development Bureau and chairman of the committee making the display of Charlevoix farm products at the Traverse City state grange the first year a display was made until he is known as Charlevoix county's chief booster. Just now he is busily engaged in the work of planning for the establishing of a farm bureau under the auspices of the federal government, details of which will be given later.

Prosecuting Attorney Fitch has kept up the work of his office in an economical manner, which was so satisfactory to his constituents that he had no opposition at the polls for another term.

Circuit Court Commissioner L'gubhart, Surveyor Robinson and Drain Commissioner Cowan, were all re-elected and are fully competent for any work in their line which may come up.

Dr. A. M. Wilkinson enters upon another term as coroner, his associate being Dr. Marshall of Boyne City, which will place one of these important officials in each end of the county. With this line up of county officials for the next two years and Senator Scott and Representative McMillan looking after our interests at Lansing, Charlevoix county is sure of being well served.

Principals in Waller-Buttars Wedding in Traverse City Last Friday.

Will Make Their Future Home in This City After Spending Winter in California.

At the home of Ray Buttars, in Traverse City, last Friday at three o'clock, occurred the nuptials of Henry E. Waller of Chicago, and Miss Mary Buttars of Northport.

The home was prettily decorated in holly and evergreens. The guests from out of town were Mr. and Mrs. George Buttars, parents of the bride, Kent and Esther Buttars, brother and sister, Mrs. Matthews, Miss Baumberger and little Margaret Baumberger, who acted as ring bearer, all of Northport, Mrs. Esther Farrey, Mr. and Mrs. John Buttars of Port Austin, Mr. and Mrs. A. Buttars and Winifred Weaver of Charlevoix, A. H. Buttars of Pellston, and Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Waller and Miss Waller of Chicago, parents and sister of the groom.

To the strains of Lohengrin's wedding march, played by Miss Lola Lintman of Traverse City, came the bridal party, consisting of the Rev. Mr. Cochlin, Kent Buttars as best man, Miss Esther Buttars, maid of honor, the ring bearer, then the groom, and following, the bride gracefully gown in white charmuse, trimmed in frill point lace, carrying a bridal wreath and accompanied by her father.

After the ceremony dainty refreshments were served by the Misses Florence Earl and Edna Miller of Traverse City and Miss Weaver, the holiday colors being carried out in the table decorations.

The happy couple left on the five o'clock train for Chicago, where they spend a little time before going to Chicago for the winter.

Mr. Waller has been a summer resident of this city for many years and both he and his charming bride have made many friends here who will welcome their return in April to make this city their future home.

COMPANY HAS BEEN ORGANIZED

New Line Manufacturing Plant Will be Installed by Next Summer.

The Charlevoix Product is Superior and Supply is Unlimited of Raw Material.

We are pleased to announce that organization plans have been perfected for the incorporation of a company to install a line manufacturing plant in this city. The new plant will be located about a mile west of the old city stone plant on what is known as the Hell land.

For several weeks the parties behind the deal have been endeavoring to get a railroad to the proposed site. Had they been successful, a number of men would have been busy now in the work of construction and the plant would have been ready for business by early spring.

Owing to unavoidable delays, however, it probably will be midsummer before the work of manufacture will actively commence. The company will devote itself exclusively to the manufacture of line. With an unlimited supply of the raw material on hand, and the well known reputation of Charlevoix line, as being of a superior quality, several large institutions now getting their supply from other states to secure line of equal value, the success of the new enterprise seems assured from the start.

CORN IMPROVEMENT

State Association Will Hold Annual Meeting Next Week at Kalamazoo.

The Michigan Corn Improvement Association will hold its ninth annual show at the Western Normal, Kalamazoo, January 6 to 11, inclusive.

It has created three divisions in the Junior Class from 8 to 12 years, 12 to 16 years and 16 to 20 years, and a sweepstake.

Valuable prizes will be given in each division. All boys and girls are requested to have their corn in by January 1.

The program will begin January 7 and continue four days. One day will be an alfalfa grower's experience meeting led by Mr. A. R. Potts. Another day will be given to the consideration of our prairie, rolling and sandy soils, and the third will be given to Juvenile Education.

LANSING FEBRUARY 11

Date Fixed for Republican State Convention—Will Nominate Several Officers.

The Republican state convention will be held at Lansing February 11. At this convention candidates will be nominated for Justice of the Supreme Court, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Regents of the University of Michigan, State Highway Commissioner, Member State Board of Education and Member State Board of Agriculture.

Secretary is Engaged.

The executive committee of the county Y. M. C. A. held a meeting at Boyne City Friday and engaged Mr. A. Bruce Ball as county secretary. Mr. Ball comes highly recommended for the past three years having successfully carried on the work in Allegan county. He will probably make his headquarters in Boyne City and is expected to begin work January 15.

BOY LOST ON LAKE MICHIGAN

Seventeen Year Old Beaver Island Boy Caught in a Gale.

Skiff Picked up by Steamer Beaver Near Harbor Last Tuesday.

After several days the men who have been making a vain search for Freddie Geneck, the 17 year old Beaver Island boy, who was lost last week have given up all hope.

Sunday afternoon, of last week, Geneck went out in a skiff to raise his nets, and was caught in a gale. On his failure to return, his employer, Mr. Cole, went in search of him but failed to find any trace. Tuesday his skiff was picked up by the steamer Beaver. The was fastened to the boat. The general belief is that the boat was swamped and he perished in the lake.

Geneck was employed in this city as a hotel porter last summer and during a part of last season was assistant wheelman on the Beaver. At the time of his disappearance he was employed on the Beaver Island where his mother Mrs. Briggs resides.

FIFTY-SIXTH BIRTHDAY

Charles R. Bellinger Surprised by Children on Christmas Day.

Christmas day will long be remembered by C. R. Bellinger, one of our city's oldest and most highly respected business men. Although Mr. Bellinger has reached the age of 56 he has never enjoyed a birthday celebration, he having been a Christmas gift to his parents.

This year Mr. Bellinger invited all his children and grand children in the city, to the number of 11, to be his guests at Christmas dinner at the Hotel Barthelet. On returning home in the evening Mr. Bellinger was invited to the dining room where a table greeted his eyes laden with all the good things which are usual at this season of the year with a candle burning to remind him of his birthday. To say he was surprised is putting it mildly. Before leaving Mr. Bellinger was presented with a beautiful signed ring to remind him that at one time at least, his birthday had been fittingly observed.

It is the wish of everybody in the city that Mr. Bellinger may be with us to enjoy many more double birthday days.

OWEN-HARSHA

Well-Known Charlevoix Girl Married in Alabama on Christmas Day.

Dispatches received by Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Harsha announce the marriage of their daughter Amy Isabel, to Mr. Mack G. Owen, on December twenty-fifth, in Gadsden, Alabama. The marriage is the culmination of a friendship formed in college days.

Mr. Owen is a real-estate man and has always lived in Alabama where he has prepared a home for his bride. Mrs. Owen was one of Charlevoix's most popular young ladies.

Bound Over for Trial.

Mr. and Mrs. Ad Beers, the Boyne Valley couple arrested a few weeks ago on a serious charge, waived examination before Justice Shephard at Boyne City, Tuesday, and were bound over to the circuit court for trial. The man's bail was fixed at $2,000 and the woman's at $1,000.

TAKES EFFECT TODAY

Parcels Post Law now in Operation—Parcel Post Stamps Must be Used.

The new parcels post law takes effect today. For the past two weeks Postmaster Fitch and his force of clerks and carriers have been studying the new system and the local office is prepared to handle the matter without a hitch.

Under the new system if a farmer desires anything it will not be necessary for him to hitch up and come to town. All he will have to do will be phone his local merchant and the package will be delivered to his door for a purely nominal charge, it being possible to have a ten pound package delivered for only 14 cents.

Another feature we have been requested to call attention to is the fact that only parcels post stamps will be accepted as articles sent under that classification, the ordinary postage stamps not being of value as formerly on parcels.

TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS

Will be Saved the State in Sending out Auto Licenses by Parcel Post.

The new parcels post law will be utilized to effect a saving of ten thousand dollars to the state on the first day of the law's operation. Arrangements were made today to ship fifty thousand automobile license plates to machine owners by mail. The former cost averaged 30 cents for each license. Under the parcels post the average cost is about 11 cents.

WHISKEY EXPLODES IN SMOKER

When Drunken Man Looks for Cork Lost From Bottle.

Train Stopped and the Flames Extinguished by Snow—Coach Seats Damaged.

Because an intoxicated passenger from Mackinac City on G. R. & I. southbound train No. 2 lost the cork of his whisky bottle and took a lighted match to search for it, considerable excitement was aroused on the smoking car early Tuesday morning and it was found necessary to stop the train between Carp Lake and Levering and use snow to put out a fire that started when the whisky exploded from contact with a match.

In the confusion, other bottles of whisky were spilt and contents ignited. The woodwork and cushions of the car suffered some damage, but quick work on the part of Philip Krausz, a sober passenger, who pulled the whistle cord, prevented a disastrous panic. Once the train was stopped the fire was easily put under control with snow.

MERRY XMAS PARTY

Forty-three guests Entertained by Mr. and Mrs. William I. Bogert.

A merry party of 43 enjoyed Xmas dinner at the home of William I. Bogert. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Rodney Bogert, Ray and Amos Bogert and Mr. Bogert's three sisters, Mrs. Charles Box, Mrs. Amos Box and children, Miss Iva Bogert, Mr. and Mrs. Gus Link and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Box all of Kingsley, and James and Henry Bogert of this city.

No Increase in Price.

Last week one of those unavoidable mistakes occurred which are always occurring. In taking the ad of the Argo Milling company over the phone, in some manner we got the price $1.45 instead of $1.25, as it should read, as the cost of bran per hundred pounds, the Argo company not having made any advance, although the advance in price is general all over the country. Although no advance has been made elsewhere it is advisable for our readers to buy in their stock while the price remains at $1.25.

BETTER FARMING IS NEEDED

Startling Statistics in Regard to Increase of Population and Production.

ADDRESS BY PROF. HOPKINS

Increase of Mouths to Feed is Five Times Increase of Source of Supply.

Land is Wearing Out—Time of Muscle Farming Has Passed—Time for Brain Farming Will Bring Big Success.

"The cause of the high cost of living goes straight back to the soil. The tariff is not responsible, not the trusts, not the middleman. These are mere incidents. High cost of living is a polite form for famine, famine since history began, has had its origin in the land."

This statement was made by Prof. Cyril G. Hopkins of the University of Illinois in a recent address. He gave statistics in support of his statement which are startling.

"In 1810 the United States had a population of 17,000,000. In 1910 it had grown to 92,000,000. Now this enormous addition to our population had to be fed. Let us see how we have fed them."

In the past ten years the increase in our population was 21 per cent. In the same period the increase in the acreage of farm lands was 4.3 per cent. At the present time only 9 per cent. of the tillable land of this country is not under cultivation and practically all of that 9 per cent. can only be reclaimed by the expensive expedients of drainage and irrigation.

The lessons which these figures teach are so plain as to need no exposition; the number of mouths to feed has increased nearly five times as rapidly as the source of our food supply.

Figures are then given showing the number of bushels of the great cereals produced in this country and the increase in the past ten years. The speaker then says:

"During this same ten years we had an increase in improved farm lands acreage of 15.1 per cent. Comparing this with a less than 1 per cent. increase in the great farm products, finding that the country has actually produced less per acre of the great cereals than it produced in the ten years before. The soil has been playing out. A soil that is totally played out is a desert and the desert is the abiding place of eternal famine."

"If you will think this over carefully, you will see that while our improved land acreage is increasing, the productivity per acre has gone down. In that circumstance lies the solution of the high cost of living problem. We have been taking from the land and putting nothing back into it. The effect has been to show itself in decreased productivity. It we are to increase productivity and we must do that because our resources in virgin lands are extremely limited—we must turn to intensive farming."

The professor then gave the results of experiments in intensive farming and the use of fertilizers and the increase in productivity, saying:

"The only fertilizers not produced by the farm itself are phosphorus and limestone. There is enough high grade phosphate rock in the United States to furnish five tons per acre for all the land in the country. We are exporting from this country every year as much phosphorus acid for $5,000,000 received at the mines, as would be required to produce twice the entire wheat crop of the United States."

"I tell of these experiments to impress upon you the fact that the time and muscle farming" has passed in this country. The time for "brain farming" is at hand. Farming of course will always be a hard work. The man who goes on a farm expecting to exert himself as little physically as he does in his office in town is not going to be a success. But there is a place in the country, and a big one, for the hustler who will take up farming and apply to it the same mental and physical energy he does to his business in town."

WORDS FROM HOME

Statements That May Be Investigated. Testimony of Charlevoix Citizens.

When a Charlevoix citizen comes to the front, telling his friends and neighbors of his experience, you can rely on his sincerity. The statements of people residing in far away places do not command your confidence. Home endorsement is the kind that backs Doan's Kidney Pills. Such testimony is convincing. Investigation proves it true. Below is a statement of a Charlevoix resident. No stronger proof of merit can be had.

H. Markwardt, Bridge St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I know that Doan's Kidney Pills are a good kidney and bladder remedy. I have used them frequently when having lame back and trouble with my kidneys. I obtained Doan's Kidney Pills from the Ivy Drug Store and they have always benefited me, removing my aches and other symptoms of kidney trouble."

COMING

A Rare Opportunity is here offered to the Sick and Suffering of our Community

Read this Carefully—Visiting Specialists from the Cleveland Institute of Medicine and Surgery of Cleveland, Ohio, will pay their first visit to Charlevoix, Michigan and will be at the Baker's Inn, Monday, January 13th

Tell Your Friends—One Day Only 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. FREE

This Institute, composed of a group of regularly graduated physicians and surgeons, licensed, legally associated under the laws of the State of Ohio, sends at its own expense these eminent medical specialists in order to introduce the newest methods and discoveries in medicine and surgery, such as the treatment under X ray, Vinet ray, Finnen ray, Hydrotherapy, Etc., to give to those who call on the above date, consultation, examination, advice and all medicines required to complete a cure, absolutely free. These specialists will diagnose your case and give you the benefit of their skill and medical knowledge free.

There is in this case no experimenting or guess work at your expense. You will be told whether you can be cured or not. If your case is curable they will put you under treatment immediately; if incurable they will give you such advice as may prolong your life. Their treatment always gives quick relief, and ultimately positively cures. Being prepared to cope with each individual case the human system is thoroughly cleansed of the disease in a natural and direct manner, and improvement is noticed at once, even the worst cases are treated without any inconvenience to the patient or the purging of his or her daily vacation.

If you are improving under your family physician, do not come and take up their valuable time, as they absolutely refuse to treat any one who is under the care of the local physicians. They wish besides to give each patient plenty of time and their undivided attention, but cannot listen in long stories not pertaining to your trouble. They have discarded the old methods and remedies used for ages by the medical world, and which it would be folly to depend upon any longer, for they are not known to cure as thousands die, depending on them for relief.

The following list of diseases only are taken under treatment, to wit: Diseases of the Nervous System, Heart, Stomach, Lungs, Kidneys, Catarrh (purulent or dry), Consumption, Epilepsy, Deafness, Diseases of Women, Tumors, Pseudo Cancer, Piles, of all Chronic Nature only. They treat Deafness by an entirely new method, and hearing in many cases is restored at once. Catarrh in all its varied forms, like other diseases if once taken under treatment is cured permanently to remain as such and to never return. It matters not whom you have seen, or with whom you have treated, do not fail to call, as a visit will cost you nothing, and may restore you to health, or even drive off prolonging your life, as thousands of persons will testify by unassailable testimonials in all parts of the country.

If you suspect Kidney Trouble, bring a two ounce bottle of your urine for chemical and microscopic analysis.

REMEMBER—The free offer is during this visit only, and will not be repeated. Persons commencing treatment upon their future visits will be required to pay, but not one cent will be asked from those commencing treatment during this visit for any medicine necessary to effect a cure, irrespective of your position in life, or the number of those who come on above date. Whenever, only who are wanted, a positive guarantee to cure will be given under their system of treatment. Those having long standing and complicated diseases, who have failed to get well and become discouraged, are particularly invited to call.

NOTICE—Married ladies without their HUSBANDS, and minors without their FATHERS, will positively not be admitted, for consultation unless accompanied by one of their legal physicians.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER IX. Criticism and Wiles.

PROFESSOR said that Senator Murchell maintained his legal residence in New Chelsea only because an unwritten law required each end of the state to be represented in the senate, and the manner which he had been elected to had been from the western district. This was only half a truth. He really liked these men and women whom his youth had been spent, who looked upon him half familiarly, half in awe, and who, until the late spring and the advent of John Dunmeade had followed unquestioningly his political gospel. Most of the time in absent, from the exigencies of his position, in Washington or in the house in Adelphi; but as he grew older he came to look forward more and more eagerly to the summer months that supported his "legal residence."

He looked, hesitating, toward the old colonial house across the street. This he started toward it. Must the house of a lifetime be broken merely to cause a son of that house to have a chance against him? And, besides, there was a small matter of business to transact. He perceived the figure of an old woman on a bench under the trees, darning industriously, and he smiled at first in amusement. Then the smile became gentler.

She looked up as he approached. He held out his hand. "Good afternoon, Miss Roberta." "Good afternoon, Will Murchell." She continued her darning. "I'll not shake hands," she answered his gesture calmly. "I don't think I'll ever shake hands with you again. John says you're a dangerous man. John is right."

"I inferred from his speech," he answered with a twinkle, "that he held some such opinion. Were you at the trial?"

"I was not! You may sit down," she commanded, making room for him "because I want to ask you a question." He obeyed. "What have you been doing to Hugh and our John? This house has been like a funeral ever since these trials began. Hugh has been as grumpy as a dog with a boll. And John—he doesn't say much, but he feels it. It's this politics, I wish," she concluded venomously, "plague'd carry off all you politicians."

"But, Roberta, who'd run the country?" "Miss Roberta smiled. "I guess the country could run itself better than you politicians do."

"So there's coolness between the judge and John, eh? I suppose they've fallen out over the trials. Naturally John is just a bit headed idealist while the judge is a practical man."

"A practical man?" she sniffed. "If you'd been doing for the judge nearly thirty years you wouldn't call him that, I guess. Why, he even believes that you're going to put him in the supreme court."

"And you don't?" "Of course not! I tell him so, but he won't believe me. He's so puffed up with his own importance and selfishness he won't listen to sense and tries to make his son's life miserable."

"Roberta," he said abruptly, "try to keep John out of politics."

"Because he is fighting you?" "That," he said sententiously, "might be a sufficient reason. But I'm not thinking of that. It isn't the game for a man of his sort."

"You didn't think of that when you believed you could use him. I wish I could keep him out. But we Dunmeades are set in our opinions. He'll go on fighting, now he's started, until he breaks himself against your hard ness or becomes like you."

He got up abruptly and went into the house. In the library he found Judge Dunmeade before his desk scratching away at an opinion. With that heavy dignity which he imparted even to the smallest actions of life the judge waved Murchell to a seat.

year for another." The judge cleared his throat. "I'll take it under consideration."

A queer smile softening the lines of his mouth the senator sat staring at the portrait of Thomas Dunmeade. "John," he said at last, "made a good speech, eh, judge?"

"The election was good," was the carefully considered answer. "But I think a Dunmeade should voice such rabid radicalism, such wild sentimentality. John's course will not affect the matter we discussed last winter will it?"

"You mean the justiceship? My influence in the organization is a little uncertain just at present. These trials haven't helped either."

"I have that also against my son," the judge said angrily. "He has made it more difficult for his father to realize a lifelong ambition. Besides," he added, "attacking my best friend. He is too selfish and set in his opinions to consider his father's interest. He doesn't get it from me. He is," the judge concluded, "his mother's son."

The senator did not smile. "His mother's son?"

He was not a sentimental man. He did not "love the memory" of Anne Dunmeade nor indulge in sweetly sad retrospection. He thought of her merely as marking one stage of his development. He remembered her as a gentle yet high spirited thing full of ardent enthusiasm and with an unshakable belief—it struck him now almost pathetically—in the goodness of his fellows and the ultimate triumph of "the right." There must have been, he thought, unsuspected possibilities—possibilities that had not been realized in him since he could love this woman. He was far from ready to admit that their realization would have been profitable.

"His mother's son. I guess that explains him," he rose. "About that justiceship—I'll see what can be done. But I promise nothing definitely so it is. You understand that?"

"Certainly," the judge assented. "But I expect you to do your best," he added with dignity. "I'll no services to my country and to my party warrant my expectation. And I ought to draw the old soldier vote to the ticket."

"And, judge," Murchell concluded, "think over the Sheehan sentence. I'll think it over." He went out of the room.

On the next Saturday morning James Sheehan, found guilty of conspiracy to falsify election returns, was summoned to bar and sentenced to four months "hard labor" in the county workhouse. But before the appeal which he took had been refused by the higher court he had left Benoun county for parts unknown.

John sought refuge in the enclaves that Benoun county provides for its district attorneys. With a sense of relief he fled away his notes on the Sheehan case in a cabinet marked "Finished Business." Then he threw himself into a chair and began to take stock.

Sheehan's eyes haunted him. John was a normal young man, and he was capable of knowing the joy of a task well done. But not this sort of task! He could find no elation in a triumph won at the cost of direct personal misery to others. There was Slayton, for example, a handsome, pleasant young man who looked the criminal not at all. He had not had the courage to stand trial, and he had broken him and fled, leaving a sick wife. She and the child born since the father's flight now lay together in a grave. Slayton had not dared to return. Perhaps he did not even know of the terrible tragedy in his dream—John often saw Slayton's hunted face as it must now appear.

He became conscious that his hand was writing, that he was tired all over every nerve in his body throbbing. For more than six months, ever since his election, he had been working feverishly, feverishly toward this day. The release from strain allowed his mind to protest, protesting body to be heard. He got up and left the office, as though fleeing from the problem.

He laid a roundabout course away from Main street out into the country. He tramped determinedly along the pike, filling his lungs with the fresh air. It had been a good "growing season." His way took him between fields of clean young corn and barley and oats and occasional cool, green wood lots.

A farmer, driving a pair of heavy farm horses doing duty at the tongue of a squeaky spring wagon, rattled up behind him.

"Howdy, John! Want a lift?" "Howdy, R! No, thank you. Just taking a little exercise and soaking in all this."

Cranshaw reined in his team. John stopped.

"Little mite too smart for 'em today weren't ye?"

"They had been so bold, they made it easier."

Cranshaw nodded. "Be smarter next time, I reckon—if we give 'em a chance. If we give 'em a chance," he repeated reflectively. "If we farmers, we're feeling pretty good about these trials. For like we didn't make any mistake last fall."

"Murchell says you forgot," John smiled back.

"Be'n at ye a'ready, has he?" Cranshaw asked shrewdly. "He'll be in ye harder, before ye're through. Ye got 'em scared. Mebbe we'll fetch 'em then mebbe we won't. But I guess that's our lookout, not yours. So far ye're concerned, all ye got to do is go ahead and try to finish up the job ye've started. If we don't do our part, I guess we won't have nobody to blame but ourselves."

"The question is, am I big enough for the job?"

cause that can't be answered till ye've tried. The question is, are ye going to be scared out by a job because it's big or are ye going to keep up what ye've started? 'F ye don't, there ain't no body else to do it. An' we'll soon be back where we started."

John nodded slowly. Cranshaw did not pursue the point.

"I see Steve Hampden's back," he remarked casually. "That girl of his was at the trial. Came in late an' had to stand by the door where I was standing. She was with some young city feller. Seen her at the rally last fall too. She seems," he grinned quizzically, "to take considerable interest in ye. So long?"

Soon he was out of sight around a turn in the road.

John swung rapidly along for an hour until the sweat oozed from every pore of his body. Then he threw himself under a tree by the roadside.

He pondered his problem. Yet he knew that it was answered, not by the inscrutable wisdom of the force which had impelled him into the fight. He could not withdraw from the task to which he had been set. Whether it was a question that he needed not to answer, so long as a straight piece of road lay ahead. He thought sadly of his father's disfigurement. And in thought of Katherine, whom, it appeared, the winter had not taught to forget him. He had not learned to forget her. Work could dull it, could not wholly still the longing for her. And yet he had not been unhappy. He knew that he could not say no to that which was calling him into service.

He walked home through the calm snowdrift. At the corner where stood the Farmers' bank he met Warren Blake and a companion. Warren stopped him to introduce the stranger. Halg, a lanky, cadaverous individual who was the author of a much criticized novel, "The Brethren."

"I heard you twisting Murchell's tail this afternoon," Halg drawled. "You don't mind, I'd like to congratulate you on your nerve. I've been wondering whether you are merely a brave man or a specimen of that splendid genus, the fool. Brother Blake inclines to the latter notion."

"Yes, Warren would," John smiled. "I do," said Warren solemnly. "I don't believe in agitation. It hurts business—and the agitator."

"In New Chelsea, Mr. Halg, we date our thanks for prosperity, good weather and the old party."

Halg's ready grin broadened as he placed a hand on Warren's shoulder. "Here, Mr. Dunmeade, but for the grace of God, stand I. My people wanted to make me a banker."

"A dollar, Mr. Halg," John put in "held close enough to the eye will hide the rest of creation."

Halg chuckled. "Now, that's good. That's very good. Wish I could have thought of it."

"As we put it in New Chelsea, are you leaving soon, Mr. Halg?" asked John.

"Lord, no! I'm here for my health. Doctor told me I'd been working too hard or not hard enough, I forgot which, and that I needed fresh air for my liver. So I trailed up here after the Hampdens, where, by the way, Brother Blake and I are doing this evening."

"Yes, and we'd better start," Warren suggested patiently.

"Ah, these fiery lovers! Come around and see me, Mr. Dunmeade."

John promised, and they parted.

He reached home to be soundly scolded by Miss Roberta for his tardiness at supper. After supper he strolled into the library. The judge was reading by the desk, the light from the lamp throwing his cold, heavy features into sharp relief. He looked up in hospitable surprise.

"Yes, judge," John generally called him judge, feeling not without reason that his father took more pride in his office than in his patrimony. On late he had had special reason for this belief.

"Not too busy if you have anything of importance to discuss. I suppose you expect me to put you on the back because you've sent another man on the road to prison?"

"I have felt that you weren't in full sympathy with it."

"I am not." The judge laid his book on the desk and sat stiffly erect. John was immediately enabled to sympathize with those unfortunates who were arraigned before his father.

"Now that the case is ended, I may speak frankly. As a judge I, of course, approve of the punishment. I'm sorry. But I don't approve your going out at your way to attack your party and Senator Murchell, a fine, clean living gentleman, who has always showed the warmest friendship for your family."

Judge Dunmeade spoke with restrained emphasis.

"And has created a pernicious machine," John added indignantly.

"Which elected you to the office you now hold?"

"Your memory isn't good, Judge. The machine nominated me. The people of Benoun county elected me, you may remember."

"You couldn't have been nominated without Murchell's endorsement."

New Year's Calling

How It Originated and Is Carried On

NEXT to Christmas the most joyous annual festival has been the advent of the new year. This has been so ever since the Christian era. As far back as the history of man can be traced the New Year day has been an occasion of feasting and rejoicing. From the oldest authentic record it has been transmitted down to our times and is still observed. The feast was instituted by Numa and was dedicated to Janus, who presided over the new year Jan. 1, 713 B. C.

In the middle ages it was religiously observed by the bow of wine and the eating of laked meats. The chieftains of the European tribes appointed it as the day of receiving their capitanes and vassals. Their chief was not allowed to receive any token of regard from his people to remind him of them during the remaining 361 days. The people soon learned to consider a good form as well as good folk, and bring with them a substantial ransom.

Queen Elizabeth made New Year's day a general court occasion. In which she greeted her loyal subjects and received their gifts. It was customary to present Queen Bess with the floral emblem procurable. All the courtiers tried to outdo each other in selecting the most magnificent treasures for their royal mistress. Sir Walter Raleigh one New Year's morning outstripped them all by presenting her majesty with a pair of woven silk hose, the first ever worn in England.

In northern climes the New Year has always been one of the chief gala days of the season. The town folks always call upon the chief magistrate and drink his health. The idea of paying New Year calls in this country is a general way for years was confined to New York state, though other states adopted it and practiced the custom to a moderate extent. The early settlers of Jolly old New Amsterdam made the advent day of the coming year the happiest of the annum. In those primitive times everybody knew each other from one end of Manhattan Island to the other. After paying their grave respects to the governor they visited each other.

When the English came to New York they continued the ancient custom which helped to cement the good fellowship that has since prevailed between the two races. For years the popularity of New Year as a day of feasting became so prominent that

A NEW YEAR'S CALL IN OLD NEW YORK. Christmas was last sight of Year by year the calling custom grew in favor.

The young women would try to do each other in the simplicity of their attire and elegance of their toilet. In the festivity of the past century the young women took pride in the fact that the clothes they wore and the tables they set were the work of their own hands. The gallants would stand out early and go over a list of a score or more, paying their respects to the mistress first and winding up at the home of their chief attracter. Every lady who was anybody in those days drank.

In fact, it was considered a duty owed to society and to his hostess to drink whenever he was asked and all the hampers up to the brim. As the city increased in size the custom increased in popularity and the acquaintance of the people in general. The half New Yorkers entered into friendly rivalries with one another as to who should receive the largest number of callers.

The "upper crust" celebrate New Year at their country homes. Occasionally a solitary caller may be seen walking through a fashionable avenue anxiously looking for a house where he once was a welcome visitor in order to pay his annual respects, but nothing greets him but closed doors and windows.

Because the fall has become past with the fashionables it does not follow that there is no railing done. The so called common people keep up the ancient custom and look forward to it for half the year.

In times gone by it was one of the pleasures of custom, and many who condemn it secretly hope that it may yet be revived with the unpleasant features left out.

Closes Next Thursday.

The Red and Blue contest of the Young People's union of the Baptist church will close next Sunday evening. Let everybody be present and show your colors, as this meeting will decide which side wins. Announcement also will be made concerning the supper to be given by the losing side. The meeting will be held up stairs in the auditorium of the church.

A Song of Christmas

By JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY

CHANT me a rhyme of Christmas.
 Sing me a jovial song.
 And, though it is filled with laughter,
 Let it be pure and strong.

Sing of the hearts brimmed over
 With the story of the day,
 Of the echo of childish voices
 That will not die away.

Of the blare of the tasseled bugle
 And the timeless clatter and beat
 Of the drum that throbs to muster Squadrons of scampering feet.

But, oh, let your voice fall fainter
 Till, blent with a minor tone,
 You temper your song with the beauty
 Of the city Christ hath shown.

And sing one verse for the voiceless
 And yet, ere the song be done,
 A verse for the ears that hear not
 And a verse for the sightless one.

For, though it be time for singing
 A merry Christmas cheer,
 Let a low, sweet voice of pathos
 Run through the melody.

Christmas in Bethlehem.

Christmas in the Holy Land is an interesting experience. Indeed, it is one never to be forgotten, and every Christmas thousands of persons from all over the world make a journey to Palestine in order to witness the various ceremonies held there during the festive season. Every one almost puts up at Jerusalem and on Christmas morning makes his way to Bethlehem, which lies almost due south, about six miles from the city, over a range of hills. No highway, the world over presents such a motley crowd as may be seen streaming along this thoroughfare early on Christmas morning.

HANDLING THE WATER SUPPLY

How Worcester Took Care of This Difficult Problem.

NO FILTRATION NECESSARY.

Massachusetts City, Although Forced to Draw Its Water From Reservoirs Exclusively, Is Never at Loss For Pressure—Compulsory Metering.

The city of Worcester, Mass., is an inland community of 160,000 inhabitants. It has no large stream or lake from which to draw water and is therefore compelled to depend upon reservoirs for the storage of water gathered from small streams running to the west of the city. These streams and reservoirs are, fortunately, located on high land, so the entire supply is delivered in the city by gravity.

The varying levels of the reservoirs and of the city itself have made it necessary and very advantageous to develop a high and low service system. The high service system is supplied by the waters of Kettle brook, impounded in four reservoirs having a combined storage of 811,000,000 gallons and a watershed of 2,623 acres and by the waters of Lynde brook, impounded in Lynde brook reservoir, with a storage capacity of 700,000,000 gallons and a watershed of 1,875 acres.

The low service system consists of two reservoirs located in the town of Holden, about six miles northwest of Worcester, and having a watershed of 3,318 acres. These two reservoirs are called Tatum brook No. 1, with a storage capacity of 700,000,000 gallons, and Tatum brook No. 2, with a storage capacity of 257,000,000 gallons. The waters of all the reservoirs are distributed in the city without filtration or treatment of any sort, and Worcester has long been known as having excellent clear and pure water. The watersheds are carefully inspected and a close and frequent inspection is made of all the buildings where any possible drainage can reach the sheds, while the shores of the reservoirs are kept clean and free from anything which could contaminate the waters.

The meter system was adopted in Worcester as soon after the system was established as practicable, and the use of meters has become almost universal. Practically all of the places metered at the present time are where it would be difficult to set and read meters and a few summer cottages.

The compulsory metering of private fire lines was adopted in 1901 and has resulted, together with the meter system, in keeping the daily rate per capita down to sixty-four gallons, a low consumption for a city where such large quantities of water are used for manufacturing purposes.

The organization of the Worcester water department consists of a water committee of seven members of the city council, to whom are referred all legislative affairs of the department. The executive work of the department is conducted by one commissioner, who has charge of the reservoirs and everything pertaining to the supply. The income division of the department is in the control of one collector, who handles all matters pertaining to raising the income from the sale of water.—American City.

GOVERNOR FERRIS

For the First Time Since 1893 Democrats Control the Executive Office.

Today, for the first time since Edwin B. Wiggins retired from the office of governor in 1893, Michigan has a Democratic governor, Woodbridge N. Ferris having been inaugurated today.

The new governor is one of the best known men in the state, and takes up the reins of government with the best wishes of the people of the entire state, members of all parties uniting in demanding that the reforms which he advocated during his campaign be written in the statute books of the state. All three of the leading parties are well represented in the legislature, which assembles today and the outlook is bright for a session which will meet the approval of all citizens of this great commonwealth.

THEATRICAL

When a play runs two years in New York City and a year in Chicago, what more need be said? It takes more than ordinary merit to reach this unequalled record; but then, "The Fortune Hunter" is an extraordinary play.

Imagine the brightest of bright comedies, the most wholesome of rural plays, and the best of the "heart-interest" drama rolled in one, and you have a fair idea of the play that held New York City for two years.

"The Fortune Hunter" is a big production, an expensive production, as well as being the best play of the season, and Manager Loskot of the Charlevoix Theater is to be congratulated for securing this dramatic gem for a performance on January 8, 1913.

Little Audrey Shrier of Washington, D. C., has been engaged to sing at the Majestic all next week. A change of program will be given each night, as she has a big repertoire of songs and ragtime melodies. Little Audrey is a sister to the famous juvenile pugilists, Mystery Don of Michigan and Young Shrier of Washington, D. C.

New Officers Elected.

At the meeting of the board of directors of the Pere Marquette railway, held in New York Monday, Samuel M. Felton was elected president to succeed William Cotter.

Felton, who is president of the Chicago Great Western, together with Frank W. Blair of Detroit and Dudley E. Walters of Grand Rapids, the receivers of the Pere Marquette, were elected directors to succeed George W. Perkins and J. L. Cramer.

At present the president and board have nothing more to do than keep up the corporate organization. The co-receivers will operate the system as since April.

ENFORCE CLEAN CITY LAWS.

Chattanooga, Police Will Arrest Citizens Whose Yards Are Unkept.

The police department, the department of streets and sewers and the health department of Chattanooga, Tenn., have joined in an effort to rid the city of the healthy "weed crops" which adorn the front yards of many Chattanoogaans, and notices have been issued the noncompliance of which will result in arrest.

Notices ordering citizens to remove tin cans and other debris from their premises will also go forth from the departments. Many complaints have reached the various city offices, and the complaints were confined to no particular locality, about the careless manner in which many of the citizens maintain their yards, and in each instance those registering the complaint asked that immediate relief be given.

Acting on the complaints, the three departments will undertake to clean the town, even though it results in the arrest of offending citizens. Every person, however, will be given ample opportunity to do the work themselves, thus saving the public cost of the city work and a fine in police court.

MUNICIPAL STABLE.

Appropriate $75,000 to Build Home For City Animals.

Lynn, Mass., is considering plans for a municipal stable. This stable has been a matter of controversy in the city government for five years, but the municipal council has now decided to let the contract.

The stable is to be of steel and brick, three stories high, and will cost about $75,000. It will be located on the West Lynn marshes. In this will be kept the horses of all the city departments, and the stable will be designed with the idea in mind that in a few years the stalls may be taken out and the building converted into a garage.

Improving the Text.

Father was walking to Sunday school with little Johnny and endeavoring to improve the time by teaching Johnny his golden text, the words of which were, "Whosoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Johnny repeated it after his father several times and seemed to have mastered the correct wording.

As they drew near the Sunday school the father gave Johnny his last rehearsal. "Now, son," he said, "let's have the golden text once more with out any help from me."

This is what he got from Johnny: "Whosoever a man sows always rips." —Harper's Bazar.

Pantheon and Parthenon.

The Parthenon, or what is left of it, stands upon the Acropolis of Athens. The most famous building on earth was erected under the administration of Pericles about B. C. 412. Its present ruinous condition was caused by the explosion of a bomb during the war between the Venetians and Turks in 1687. The Pantheon at Rome was built by Agrippa in B. C. 27 and, unlike the more beautiful temple at Athens, is still in a fair state of preservation. The Pantheon is, of course, well worth seeing both for its own sake and on account of its historic interest, but it does not hold the fame belonging to the incomparable building on the Acropolis. —New York American.

Brown Pays the Freight and Delivers the Goods

Beginning January 1, we will be able to offer you the promptest delivery service you ever knew. After that date you can telephone in your order for whatever you need in our line, and it will be delivered to you within a few hours. There will be no need of your waiting until you come to town to order your goods. You can drop us a postal any time or call us up over the phone—our number you know is 40—and expect your order just as soon as the mails can bring it. The new parcels post makes this possible.

We also wish to advise you that, without carrying a larger stock, we are now in a much better position to fill all your wants than ever before. It is now possible for us to order our supplies from the wholesale houses and get them quicker than ever before, thus making it possible for us to really increase our stock without investing any more money—a fact which enables us to sell cheaper than even the largest stores in the big cities can afford to do. You can save much money in the course of a year by dealing with us and taking advantage of our quick-delivery service. You will always find our prices right, and if ever you get something which is not to your satisfaction, we will be glad to make it right.

WORK OF THE FARM BUREAU

Explained in Interesting Communication from Professor J. C. McDowell.

OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT

Much Benefit Already Has Been Received From The Work in This State.

Appropriation is Limited so if Counties Wish to Receive Benefit They Must Get Busy—Aid From Other Sources.

As several times noted a movement is on foot for the establishment of a farm bureau in this county. D. S. Payton having been appointed to ascertain the sentiment in regard to the same. The following from Prof. McDowell, who has the work in charge, gives a full explanation of what it is hoped to accomplish. "This is the greatest governmental work ever proposed in behalf of agriculture and will prove of untold value to the entire country. To receive a portion of the appropriation it is necessary that a county get busy as applications are already coming in faster than the money is available.

The office of farm management of the Bureau of Plant Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with the various state agricultural colleges, has recently undertaken to co-operate with counties in placing in each county a trained agriculturist in charge of field studies and demonstrations. The purpose of the work is to increase the productivity of farm lands and at the same time maintain their fertility. This is not for the benefit of the farmers only, because increased production adds to the total wealth of the country and decreases the cost of living generally.

Forty county agents are appointed and at work. We have altogether one hundred forty-one management men in the field. Five trained men are now engaged as county agents or district supervisors in New York state, one in Vermont, two in New Jersey, six in Pennsylvania, nine in Ohio, one in Indiana, eight in Michigan, one in Illinois, six in Minnesota, two in Iowa and one in South Dakota. This work has also been extended into many western states. In the south the office of farm management is carrying on extensive investigations. Preliminary arrangements have already been made to add to this force a large number of county field agents. About eighty applications for co-operation are now on file from as many counties.

While this work is comparatively new, it gives every promise of being as far-reaching and valuable as any yet started by the government. The hearty co-operation of the state institutions and of the leading farmers and business men in various counties is making this work very popular and at the same time efficient.

In this work only men who were brought up on the farm are employed. They must have graduated from the school of hard knocks as well as from high school and college. They do not pose as having solved all the problems of agriculture, but they are willing to work day after day and month after month with the farmers on the farm, and to stay right by these problems until they are solved.

During the past three years Mr. A. B. Ross has had charge of the farm management work in one of the counties of southern Pennsylvania. The farmers of that county are well pleased to have his co-operation, because he attacks all his problems in a matter-of-fact, businesslike manner. Through his initiative they are spraying their fruit trees, and under his guidance they are sorting, grading and packing their fruit and sending it to market in such an attractive form that it meets with a ready sale. This he is doing in a section that formerly produced very little marketable fruit. Mr. Ross did not stop with producing, grading, packing, and shipping the fruit, but he went on to the city markets and secured a square and honest deal from the commission men.

Dozens of farmers are preparing their land for clover according to his instructions, and under his direction they are increasing the yield. An increased yield of from one-fourth to one-half ton of hay per acre on an average is the result. His work with corn, potatoes, soy beans, etc., if given in full would make too long a story. It is sufficient to say that he is earning his salary many times over, and that his undertakings are appreciated in the locality where he is at work. It has been estimated that his work has added over a hundred thousand dollars annually to the income of the farmers of the county.

Mr. H. W. Gilbertson is doing similar work in Sussex county, New Jersey; while in New York most excellent work is being done by J. T. Barron in Broome county, by F. E. Robertson in Jefferson county, by G. E. Monroe in Tompkins county, and by G. P. Scoville in Chemung county. Space will not permit a discussion of the work of each of these men, neither will it allow even the mention of the names of those in charge of similar work in other states in the North and West; but I wish to say a few words concerning the work recently begun in Michigan.

JUDGE McCABE DIES THURSDAY

Prominent Soldier and Lawyer of Petoskey After Long Illness.

For Ten Years Had Occupied the Position of United States Judge in Philippines.

Judge Albert McCabe, United States district judge in the Philippines, died Thursday morning at Rochester, Minn.

Judge McCabe, son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas McCabe, was born March 22, 1866, at Philadelphia. In 1879 the family, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. McCabe and sons, Albert and George, moved to Petoskey to reside.

After his graduation from the law department of the University of Michigan Albert took up practice in Petoskey with Judge C. J. Paithorp. When the Spanish-American war broke out Albert enlisted and was made captain of Company C from Petoskey. During the war he also acted as judge advocate.

Returning from the war Mr. McCabe established an individual law practice in Petoskey, but when hostilities began in the Philippines he was made a lieutenant and entered the service again. When peace was declared he practiced law at Manila for a short period and later was made chief of the forestry department, a position he held for a year before being appointed United States judge, stationed at Manila.

When his prospects were the brightest Judge McCabe was taken ill, presumably the result of tumors, and his condition became so bad he was told he must get out of the Philippines. He did so and after arriving in Petoskey gained steadily. On Thanksgiving day he was feeling fine, but on that day he was in a runaway accident, which, it appears, gave him a great setback, as he began to decline. When the Mayo surgeons at Rochester, Minn., examined him they refused to operate until he gained strength and he was obliged to stay in bed. He did not improve, however, and the operation which was planned could not be performed. His brother, George McCabe, a Petoskey hardware man, was called to his bedside several days ago.

Besides the widow Judge McCabe is survived by both his parents and his brother.

GOVERNOR FERRIS RECOMMENDS MUCH REFORM LEGISLATION

Initiative, Referendum and Recall—Abolition of Party Primary Enrollment—Real Australian Ballot—Torrens' System of Land Transfers—Abolishment of Useless Offices—Uniform Text Book System.

Governor Ferris in his inaugural message made many recommendations of reform legislation. The principal features follow: Initiative and referendum. Recall of all officials but judges. Real Australian ballot, abolishing party columns. Abolishment of party enrollment. Repeal of the so-called "15 per cent clause" in the primary law. Making all state officials below lieutenant-governor appointive. Oregon system of publicity by which campaign arguments are printed by the state for all candidates.

Direct election of United States senators.

Fuller measure for home rule for cities, including a 10 per cent initiative and recall.

Piecemeal amendment to city charters.

Separation of state and local taxation. He suggests for consideration three possible sources of revenue, as follows:

Inheritance tax. Graduated income tax. Corporate excess plan.

Public utilities commission to regulate all public service corporations in the state.

Kansas "blue sky" law. Closer supervision of private banks and protection of depositors. Creation of a Commissioner of Agriculture.

Torrens' system of land transfers. State encouragement of good roads.

Inspection of mines to prevent accidents.

State weight and measure law, administered by dairy and food department.

Abolishment of the following offices: Oil inspector, salt inspector, state sanitary commission, coroners and circuit court commissioners.

Oil inspection to be continued by single employee of dairy and food department; sanitary work to be done by dairy and food department or agricultural college; work of coroners and circuit court commissioners to be done by justices of the peace.

Better sanitation, ventilation and heating of school houses.

School boards of not more than seven members, elected at large.

Uniform system of text books up to eighth grade.

Continuance of present primary school fund.

Requirement that all medical practitioners pass examination in physiology, anatomy, hygiene, chemistry, bacteriology, physics, pathology and diagnosis.

Civil service. Weekly payment of employees in all industrial plants.

Reduction of state employees to the minimum.

WILL ASK FOR STRONGER LAWS

Would Restrict Sale of Liquor by Druggists in all Counties.

More Stringent Law Also Asked for Punishment of Wife Deserters.

The Michigan Prosecutors' association held a meeting in Representative hall at Lansing recently and endorsed much new legislation recommended by the legislative committee, which consisted of Charles H. Hayden, Lansing; A. W. Black, East Lansing; and C. C. Goggin, Alma.

The prosecutors recommended that the law be changed to make it necessary for druggists to require prescriptions for the sale of liquor in counties not affected by the local option law, as well as in local option counties. Figures gathered showed that druggists in the so-called wet counties abused their discretion in many instances and many of them had saloons without paying licenses.

Another change asked was in relation to wife deserters. At present a wife deserter is a disorderly person and the charge against him is heard by a justice. The association asks that the action be made a felony and thus brought under the circuit court. At present the justice can only put the offender under bonds for three months, which affords children but little protection. The circuit judges would be able to make the bonds longer.

Officers were elected as follows: President, Earl Michener, Adrian; vice-president, C. H. Hayden, Lansing; secretary and treasurer, C. C. Goggin, Alma.

WOMAN HAD TOO MANY CHILDREN

Billy Miller Takes a Trip to Petoskey Monday Afternoon.

"Ain't There any Automobiles Around Here That a Fellow Can Ride Home in?"

When a Charlevoix woman counted her brood of youngsters after transferring from the Pere Marquette to the U. R. & L. station in Petoskey, Monday, she made the amazing discovery that she had one too many boys. She at once took her new possession to the home of Assistant Agent E. E. Cross, on West Mitchell street, and the lad, who gave his name as "Billy Miller," became a temporary member of that household.

Telephone connections were made with Charlevoix, and it was not long before relatives of "Billy," who proved to be three years old, were located. The mother, Mrs. Laura Miller, came over on the night train and returned in the morning with her little son.

It developed the lad had wandered away from his home at Charlevoix and rode with a hussman to the station, where he coolly boarded the train and came to Petoskey, getting mixed in with the other children on the way. Billy is a cute little fellow and as smart as a whip. His predicament didn't worry him in the least; in fact, he couldn't even see that it was a predicament. When he was taken into a local store by Mr. Cross he wanted to know:

"Ain't there any automobiles around here that a fellow can ride home in?"

CIVIC LEAGUE ORGANIZED

To Assist the Officers in Enforcing Law Against Gambling, etc.

Monday evening twenty-five men met in the council room and effected an organization to be known as the Charlevoix Civic League. Rev. Quinton Walker stated that the object of the league was to give moral support of the county and city officials who were enforcing the law against gambling and bootlegging, also to assist in securing evidence against violations of the law.

The meeting took the order of a Methodist class meeting, where every person took part. A. L. Coulter pleaded for more spine among men. Alderman Glassford expressed his faith in his honor, Mayor Nordrum, Rev. Mr. Taggart and James Saunders told of the difficulty they had experienced in enforcing the law. Rev. Mr. Atchison moved that Dr. A. M. Wilkinson be elected chairman. He was elected.

The following officers were elected: president, Dr. A. M. Wilkinson; vice-president, James McGeagh; secretary, James Saunders; treasurer, Charles Carey.

CAPTURED MANY PRIZES

Charlevoix Chicken Fanciers Gain Honors at Petoskey Poultry Show.

In Competition With Over Eight Hundred of Best Birds in the State.

The second annual poultry show of the Emmet county poultry association, held at Petoskey last week, was one of the best exhibitions ever held in this part of the state, both in the number of entries and the quality of birds exhibited. In all there were over 800 entries.

A number of Charlevoix fanciers had birds on exhibition and although they entered into competition with some of the best known chicken fanciers in the state, they carried away a number of prizes, showing that Charlevoix has some of the best birds to be found in Michigan. The following are the prizes won by Charlevoix breeders:

White Wyandottes: R. C. Korth, second, cock; third, cockerel; fourth, hen; fifth, pullet.

Black Langshans: Henry Marshall, second, cock; third, cockerel; second, hen; third, hen; fourth, hen, second pen.

Barred Plymouth Rocks: E. J. Miller, first, cock; first, cockerel; second, cockerel; third, cockerel; fourth, cockerel.

Dr. J. A. Auld, second, cock; third, hen; first, pullet; third, pullet; first pen.

White Plymouth Rocks: R. C. Korth, second, cock; fourth, cock; first, cockerel; third, pen.

Black Orpingtons: A. J. Usher, second, cock; first, cockerel; third, cockerel; fourth, cockerel; first pullet; third, pullet; second pen.

Rose Comb Brown Leghorns: L. E. Benton, first, cock; first, cockerel; first, hen; second, hen; third, hen; first, pullet; second pullet; third pullet; first pen.

Ancona: G. E. Dutton, first, cock; first, cockerel; third, hen; second, pullet; third, pullet; fourth pullet; first pen.

Another plan places Montcalm county in with most of Congressmen Fordney's present Eighth district of the new Ninth. This would make it necessary either for Fordney or Lindquist to quit. Still another plan talked of, puts Montcalm in with Kent and Ionia to make the new Sixth, bringing Mr. Lindquist and Mr. Mapes into conflict.

But the chances are that Mecosta and Montcalm will be shunted over into McLaughlin's district. Isabella and Gratiot of the present Eleventh district are slated to be pushed over into Fordney's district.

That makes four of Lindquist's counties gone. Antrim, Grand Traverse, Kalkaska, Missaukee, Roscommon, Clare and Osceola are slated to ride in the new Eleventh district, which will be mostly the old Tenth, to be represented by Roy Woodruff, hereafter, and Charlevoix is scheduled to ride in the new Twelfth district. Thus Montcalm and Mecosta will be the only two counties of the present Eleventh district to remain in the same district with Mr. Lindquist.

On New Years Day Miss Alma Francis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Francis of this city, and John O. Plank of Charlevoix and Fox Island, were quietly married at the home of the bride's parents, Rev. T. E. Taggart officiating.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Plank are very popular in this city and have the best wishes of their host of friends.

WHERE WILL WE LAND

Eleventh Congressional District will Probably be Wiped off the Map.

BY RE-APPORTIONMENT ACT

Such Seems to be the General Opinion of State Politicians.

Charlevoix County Will Probably be put into the new Twelfth District With the Upper Peninsula.

One of the most important duties of the new legislature will be the redistricting of the state in new congressional districts and to Charlevoix county "what will be done with the eleventh district."

This district was formed about twenty years ago and when the democrats were in full control of the state. It was part of a general plan to group the counties as to make as many democratic districts as possible. It was intended to make the eleventh overwhelmingly republican and then give a better chance for democratic success in adjacent districts. They accomplished their purpose in this district but fell down in their hopes elsewhere, for the strong republican current which set in has kept a solid or nearly solid delegation from Michigan ever since.

Ten years ago the republican delegation continued unchanged in number and was so satisfactory in character that no change was made. But this year it is different. We now have thirteen congressmen and but twelve districts. In the present congress the deficiency has been made up by electing one congressman at large, but it is unlikely that the plan will be continued so it now looks as if the state would be redistricted by a republican legislature, but the bill must be signed by a democratic governor. No gerrymander or partisan advantage is possible.

A recent issue of the Grand Rapids Herald prognosticated as follows:

"Several different plans for redistricting Michigan's congressional districts have been proposed; a feature of the plans so far made and in this every plan agrees with each other, is that the famous old Eleventh district—the shoe string district, the district in which there have been more political leads than in any other in the state, the district in which Francis O. Lindquist made his sensational run this summer and fall—disappears—is wiped out."

The plan so far suggested splits up the counties of this old district among so many districts that nothing is left of the famous battle ground. Congressman-elect Lindquist lives in Montcalm county. One plan suggested places Montcalm and Mecosta, both at the Eleventh district, over into the new Tenth district, which will be composed mostly of the counties of Congressman McLaughlin's present Ninth district. There, Mr. Lindquist and Mr. McLaughlin will find themselves in the same district and one will have to quit.

Another plan places Montcalm county in with most of Congressmen Fordney's present Eighth district of the new Ninth. This would make it necessary either for Fordney or Lindquist to quit. Still another plan talked of, puts Montcalm in with Kent and Ionia to make the new Sixth, bringing Mr. Lindquist and Mr. Mapes into conflict.

But the chances are that Mecosta and Montcalm will be shunted over into McLaughlin's district. Isabella and Gratiot of the present Eleventh district are slated to be pushed over into Fordney's district.

That makes four of Lindquist's counties gone. Antrim, Grand Traverse, Kalkaska, Missaukee, Roscommon, Clare and Osceola are slated to ride in the new Eleventh district, which will be mostly the old Tenth, to be represented by Roy Woodruff, hereafter, and Charlevoix is scheduled to ride in the new Twelfth district. Thus Montcalm and Mecosta will be the only two counties of the present Eleventh district to remain in the same district with Mr. Lindquist.

AUTOMOBILE TAX

Michigan Good Roads Association Urges It Go to Good Roads Fund.

Upon the request of P. T. Colgrove of Hastings, president of the Michigan State Good Roads association, Attorney General Wykes of Lansing, has rendered an opinion as to the constitutionality of certain legislation which the association proposes to urge. The plan is for a bill to require automobiles of 20 horse power or less to pay a license fee of $3; those of over 20 and not more than 30 to pay $5, and those of over 30 horse power to pay $10, the money to go to the good roads fund. In his opinion the attorney general holds that the license fee is constitutional and points out that the association may, if it desires, propose a bill to require automobile owners to pay specific tax on their machines and the tax to go to the good roads fund.

COMING

A Rare Opportunity is here offered to the Sick and Suffering of our Community.

Read this Carefully—Visiting Specialists from the Cleveland Institute of Medicine and Surgery of Cleveland, Ohio, will pay their first visit to

Charlevoix, Michigan and will be at the Baker's Inn, Monday, January 13th

Tell Your Friends—One Day Only 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. FREE

This Institute, composed of a group of regularly graduated physicians and surgeons, licensed, legally associated under the laws of the State of Ohio, sends at its own expense these eminent medical specialists in order to introduce the newest methods and discoveries in medicine and surgery, such as the treatment under X-ray, Violet ray, Finster ray, Hydrotherapy, Etc., to give to those who call on the above date, consultation, examination, advice and all medicines required to complete a cure, absolutely free. These specialists will diagnose your case and give you the benefit of their skill and medical knowledge free.

There is in this case no experimenting or guess work at your expense. You will be told whether you can be cured or not. If your case is curable they will put you under treatment immediately; if incurable they will give you such advice as may prolong your life; their treatment always gives quick relief, and ultimately positively cures. Being prepared to cope with each individual case the human system is thoroughly cleansed of the disease in a natural and direct manner, and improvement is noticed at once; even the worst cases are treated without any inconvenience to the patient or the pursuing of his or her daily vocation.

If you are improving under your family physician, do not come, and take up their valuable time, as they absolutely refuse to treat any one who is under the care of the local physicians. They wish besides to give each patient plenty of time and their undivided attention, but cannot list to long stories not pertaining to your trouble. They have discarded the old methods and remedies used for ages by the medical world, and which it would be folly to depend upon any longer, for they are not known to cure as thousands die, depending on them for relief. The following list of diseases only are taken under treatment, to-wit: Diseases of the Nervous System, Heart, Stomach, Lungs, Kidneys, Catarrh, (prostate) or dry, Constipation, Epilepsy, Deafness, Diseases of women, Tumors, Pseudo Cancers, Piles, of a Chronic Nature only. They treat Deafness by an entirely new method, and hearing in many cases is restored at once. Catarrh in all its varied forms, like other diseases if once taken under treatment, is cured permanently to remain so and to never return. It matters not whom you have seen, or with whom you have treated, do not fail to call, as a visit will cost you nothing, and may restore you to health, or even save or prolong your life, as thousands of persons will testify by unassailable testimonials in all parts of the country. If you suspect Kidney Trouble, bring a two ounce bottle of your urine for chemical and microscopic analysis.

REMEMBER—The free offer is during this visit only, and will not be repeated. Persons commencing treatment upon their future visits will be required to pay, but not one cent will be asked from those commencing treatment during this visit for any medicine necessary to effect a cure, irrespective of your position in life, or the number of those who come on above date. Whenever, or by whom wanted, a positive guarantee to cure will be given under their system of treatment. Those having long standing and complicated diseases, who have failed to get well and become discouraged, are particularly invited to call.

NOTICE—Married ladies without their HUSBANDS, and men or women without their FATHERS, will not be admitted in consultation unless accompanied by one of their local physicians.

Early Easter This Year.

Milliners and dressmakers have already been reminded of the date upon which Easter comes this year. Not in 95 years has Easter come any earlier in the year than it will in 1913, and it will not come as early again for another 87 years. Next Easter falls on March 23. Not since 1815 did it arrive sooner in the year. In that year it came on March 22. Not until after the year 2000 will it come so early again.

ONE MILLION DOLLARS

State Highway Commission Will Ask Appropriation of This Amount for Good Roads.

Members of the state highway commission are preparing a bill, which they will introduce when the legislature convenes again, asking for an appropriation for good roads. The bill provides that $100,000 shall be appropriated in 1914 and $600,000 in 1915. It is stated, however, that if the bill providing for a special tax on automobiles is passed and the money derived from this source is turned into the highway fund, the appropriation bill will be withdrawn.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER X Apples of Eden.

IF the summer before had been gay, what shall we say of that which now opened? The center of gaiety was East ridge. The Italian villa was the scene of one continuous house party.

It was inevitable that John and Katherine should meet. It happened one morning a few days after the Sheehan trial when John was leaving the postoffice with his daily mail. A trap drew up in which sat Katherine and a young man. John remembered a saying of hers concerning one whom "people were apt to sneer at as a speculator," but whom she thought "splendid" because he had had the brains and courage to make his own fight and win. He had no difficulty in identifying that man with Gregg, of whom he had heard more than once. Gregg was an attractive fellow, a few years older than John, of athletic build and pleasant manner. He joined Katherine in congratulating John on his recently acquired fame.

"We expect to see you often on the ridge. There will be tennis. He will take you play," she said to Gregg who responded pleasantly.

"I'd like to have the chance, Mr. Danneville. I've been hearing about your game."

But, although Gregg spent nearly every week end on the ridge, John did not keep his promise. Indeed, he had little time for recreation, and that little was put in with Halse, with whom he was rapidly cementing a friendship. The June primaries were at hand. John felt less pride than responsibility when he found that he was expected to lead the campaign to capture the county nominations from the machine and that, by tacit consent of friends and enemies alike, upon him devolved the task of choosing the reform ticket. He gave much thought to this task. It was not simple. There were many unworthy gentlemen, he discovered, willing to be swept into office by the wave of popular protest. And he could have learned here, had he been so minded, that even a reformer must employ the wisdom of the serpent. He selected results at which a politician might have sneered, but which were on the whole very promising in the light of his inexperience.

In Halse John found an unexpected but invaluable aid. The novelist and once been a political reporter. The reform ticket was nominated. Murchell, cynically willing to let the reform wave run his brief course, withheld his hand. Borett of his familiar weapon, fraud, the machine was easily conquered by a people thoroughly angered. Even Hallowell gave the reformers a small majority. Halse hailed John as a "little boss."

John indignantly rejected the title. "My work is done, or, at least, will be when they're elected. I can't interfere with them then."

"Say, aren't you afraid the cows will take you for a bunch of nice, green, succulent clover? Just wait. Halse grinned, "until they're in office. Make no mistake, sonny; you'll need to keep a tight rein on them. About a year from now I expect to see some pretty little, homelike illusions badly busted."

The promised journey to the ridge had not yet been made.

One afternoon Halse found him busy in his office. "How's the bosslet? Had a shave today? Feeling conversational?" You and I are going out for a little drive this afternoon.

"We're not. I hope you are. I've got things to do."

"This American habit of industry is becoming a positive mania. Are you coming peacefully or will you go any-how?"

"I'll do neither," John continued his writing.

"All right," Halse seated himself, deposited his feet on the desk beside John and commenced an apparently interminable monologue on the apocryphal cleverness of a dog he once had owned.

John threw down his pen in disgust. "I surrender," he groaned. "I'll go to get rid of you."

"Thought I could persuade you. Come right along. I've got a buggy outside."

John put his papers away and meekly followed to the waiting vehicle. Halse drove, chattering volubly of whatever came into his mind. But when Halse turned into the ridge road John stirred uneasily.

"Going anywhere in particular?"

"Anywhere you'd like to go?"

"No-o, I guess not."

"Then we'll go to the Hampdens. There's always somebody there."

"Oh, no, we won't. Let's go back the other direction. I like the south road better."

"Oh, you do! Why not Hampdens?"

"Well, you see," John began to explain lamely. "Hampden and I aren't on very good terms and"—

"Lord! Don't I know that? He spends most of his time enumerating

"I've brought him!"

the different kinds of fool you are. I sometimes think his list is incomplete. But what difference does that make? We aren't going to see him. There's a fellow up there—Gregg—that I want you to play tennis with."

"I haven't had a racket in my hand all summer," John protested.

"Nacht nichts aus! I've never seen you play, but you can beat him. You've got to. He's got my scalp so often I have to take revenge by proxy. Besides, you need a little frivolity. You're beginning to take yourself seriously, and that's a bad sign."

"But I'm not fixed up for it," John looked at his shoes, upon which a thin coating of dust had settled.

Halse surveyed him and then stretched out over the dashboard a lean shank, the trouser of which had not felt an iron for many a day. "You're a real far dude beside me."

"Oh, leave it your own way," John agreed with as good grace as possible. He could not well explain that he and Katherine had been in love, and that he was still in the same case though she had probably recovered, that he had persistently stayed away from her for the sake of his peace of mind, and—Almost any excuse for yielding will serve when one is resisting a weakness to which one both wishes and does not wish to succumb.

On the shaded eastern terrace they found a small group of young people of both sexes. Halse saluted them with a triumphant hail. "I've brought him! Now, you broker man, I'll bet you $10 he can beat you, best two out of three sets."

Katherine rose and came forward to meet them. Gregg accompanied her, almost with the air of a host. It seemed to John. They greeted the newcomers cordially. Katherine with such a notable absence of constraint that John, who had served himself for an ordeal, was rather heavily let down. He could almost have believed that she had forgotten the ride home under the October moon.

It was undeniably pleasant to sit luxuriously in the comfortable wicker chair, watching the play of animated young faces, from whose freshness neither work nor worry had subtracted, against the background of greenward and dowering shrubbery. Down suddenly he tossed a light word on the eddy of conversation. He noticed that when he spoke alight, especially the moon, showed interest. That, too, was pleasant.

Later Gregg reminded him of the promised match, and when they had dined Halse it was played. John lost, although after the first set he gave his opponent a hard game. Gregg proved a generous conqueror, finding more excuses for his lucky victory than John could have devised. "The latter enjoyed every point, especially when Halse, grumbling something about a "thrown match," paid his bet. Afterward, in the physical contentment consequent upon hard exercise and a good tubbing, he stayed to dinner, a very gay, informal affair served on the terrace by candlelight. John was almost regretful when the time came to leave.

Late that night, going over the day, he found that he had talked a great deal with Katherine, but never alone. He was loving.

"I am very glad you came," she said brightly. "You will come again?"

"And I am glad. I certainly shall."

Then it was thought he caught a question flickering momentarily in her eyes. But the question, if there at all save in his imagination, was gone before he could make sure.

He was silent during the drive home, and Halse, busily humming the pilgrims' chorus, would not try to interrupt his thoughts.

Halse's parting shot as they separated was, "Now I've shown you the way, go up there often. You'll be a brighter and bolder man for it."

John went, not often and always in Halse's company. It is true, but often enough to keep burning brightly the fires within him.

If John's love affairs remained in spite of those of another advanced at least to a climax. And the eyes of banker and trusteeships. When Halse found time to contribute to the gayety of the ridge that is to say, he was frequently to be found on the Hampden terrace, an inconspicuous, often half forgotten listener to the nimble gossip and badinage. Had he been more obtrusive it is probable that he would have been annihilated into staying away. But one does not greatly resent the attentions of a shadow, and one day he proposed to Katherine and was rejected.

"Why don't you marry John Danneville?" he asked abruptly.

She turned on him angrily. "Warren! That is an!"

"An impertinence?" he interrupted again evenly. "You will allow me this time. I'm not likely to bother you much again. You were in love with him last summer. And you aren't the sort that forgets. Nor is he, I think. He will go further than any of us. He'll go better. He is what you need with me—with Gregg—you would be merely a pleasant incident. You know that yourself. I think you're fighting against that knowledge. Don't do it." It was the longest speech she had ever heard from his lips.

When they were nearing home she turned to him again. "I didn't know you and he were friends."

"We are not," he replied simply. "He doesn't care for me."

"You are mistaken about him and me," she said steadily. "But that you could plead for him when you— Oh! I call that fine, Warren!" she ended impulsively.

"I'm thinking of you," he said. "Since I can't have what I want I want you to have what you need."

When he left for more than an hour she sat, chin propped in one hand, gazing out over the green hills. "Gregg! It's just a jumble," she sighed. "What I want, I wish I weren't so. I wish he— She did not indicate what she wished, and she was not referring to Warren Blake.

Senator Murchell, after several weeks' absence, had returned to his "legal residence." On his roundabout journey homeward he had been interviewed by many reporters concerning a rumored revolt in the organization.

A few days after the senator's return New Chelsea was visited by a monarch. But he came incognito, with a notable absence of regal splendor. To Silas Halse, at the station, appeared a short, square whiskered, alert man who asked to be taken to Senator Murchell's home.

"Senator's out to the farm," Silas responded in the omniscience of back men.

"Then take me to the farm,"

Arrived at the farm, he received another command—to wait. A hired man was repairing a broken place in the fence. From him royalty demanded to know the whereabouts of the prime minister and was told to seek him in the potato patch.

In the middle of the potato patch the visitor beheld the figure of his minister, arrayed in a pair of the hired man's overalls and a straw hat of enormous bill, busily hoeing. Toward this truly rural figure Sackett—for our monarch is no other than the president of the great Atlantic railroad—made his way, considerably to the damage of the vines beneath his feet.

"Careful!" admonished the senator. "Walk between the hills."

Sackett became more careful. "How are you, senator?"

"How're you, Sackett?"

They hands met, to part instantly.

"What," Sackett demanded, "is the matter with Sherrod?"

"He wants too much," Murchell answered briefly.

"I was talking to him last week," Murchell turned on him suddenly. "Told you I ought to get down from the head of the organization, didn't he? Told you that Abolition and the Steel City are turning against me, that he wants to be governor and that the Steel people want Parrott for my job in the senate, didn't he?"

"You fellows," Sackett exploded irritably, "had better settle your squabbles or you'll give some incendiary the chance to step in and raise Cain. The trouble is Sherrod is close to the Steel City organization, and the Michigan is trying to get into the city." The scene of the royal irritation is out. A competing monarch is making ready to invade his dominion.

Murchell smiled bitterly. "So that's it? For twenty years I've been doing your dirty work. And now at the first threat of competition you're ready to throw me over without a scruple. If you think it's safe! It isn't safe, Sackett."

Sackett's eyes snapped angrily. "I've my duty to my stockholders, of whom you are one. Can you keep the Michigan out?"

"I don't know, so I won't promise. But have I ever failed you yet?"

"I don't believe you can do it. You're too unpopular with the organization. You've been too strong handed. Things are ripe for a revolt. Why, you can't even control your own county."

"When I give up hope for this county," the senator answered sharply, "you can talk. All that's been said before. How do you expect me to keep these hungry coyotes in line—by quoting Golden Rule Scripture at 'em? Do you want to go back to the old good rilla days, Sackett?"

Sackett stared moodily at his feet. Murchell took off his old straw hat and brand against the tree. He waited until Sackett was ready to speak.

"About Parrott," Sackett said after a long pause. "Murchell and Flick want him for senator."

"He's slated for governor. I like my job."

"But Sherrod wants to be governor?"

"He'll take what he's earned and can get," Murchell said shortly. "Parrott can have Roschen's place four years from now—maybe. Well, see?"

"But they want him to have your place. They say," Sackett explained with that brutal frankness which he naturally associates with royalty. "He's nothing but a politician and has been handling with a lot of inular things, while Parrott is a fine lawyer and could easily work up a reputation as a statesman. They figure he could get 'em more. And they don't care whether the Michigan gets in or not. They think they'd get better rates. And they're afraid that you and Sherrod with your squabbles will split the milk. I'm afraid of that too. Senator, you're getting to be an old man. You've had enough. Why don't you—retire?"

"Old, am I?" exclaimed Murchell harshly. "Want me to retire, do you? Well, I won't. And I'll tell you why. Because the organization, the power, is mine. Set your mind easy. I'm too old to learn new tricks. I'll not turn agitator like these dreamers and fellows with a grievance. The Michigan won't come in, if I can help it. But Sherrod won't be governor, and Parrott won't get my seat. I'm not going to give up what I've worked for all my life. You tell 'em that I like my job and that I'm not too old to run it. Aud, Sackett," he added, "play fair, play fair."

Sackett left, wondering if in an enlightened, up to date monarchy a politician could have more power than his liege. Sackett would have been surprised had he known that the senator's mind was not on the conversation just ended. He was seeing very clearly the gray-green eyes of a young woman and measuring himself against a young man who once had been.

Mr. M. J. Thompson began his work with headquarters at Manistee, Michigan, on April 1 of the present year. Since then he has given most of his time to a field survey of the ten counties in which he is at work. He has already found many interesting problems, and with the help of the best farmers of his district these problems are being studied and many of them will eventually be solved. He found clover yields low and hay selling around $20 a ton, and baled hay as high as $27 a ton. He reports that there is much difficulty in getting a good stand of clover, and that this is due more to the sourness of the soils than to drought and cold winters. Sourness of soil is easily corrected by applying marl or limestone. Concerning alfalfa he writes as follows: "Alfalfa is making remarkable growth on some very light soils in various places, requiring always in such cases heavy appliances of lime."

Mr. Thompson has in his territory a portion of the great potato belt of Michigan. From this section large amounts of money are sent away annually to purchase seed. This is money that is badly needed at home and should be spent there. No valid reason can be given as to why Michigan farmers cannot produce their own seed potatoes, seed corn and seed grain of various kinds. If under his direction hill selection of seed potatoes, ear-to-row selection and breeding of corn, and the thorough grading of seed grain becomes common, Mr. Thompson and the intelligent farmers who help him will have accomplished more for the permanent prosperity of the state of Michigan than can be accomplished by all the wire-pulling politicians in a thousand years.

The production of the hairy vetch for seed and forage is attracting considerable attention in the counties of western Michigan, and this crop should be grown much more extensively on the sandy lands of Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota. The seed is selling at about $7.50 a bushel at the present time and most of it is shipped into this country from Germany, though the soils of Michigan are especially adapted to its successful production.

The conservation of soil fertility; the building up of the more productive soil; the successful production of alfalfa, hairy vetch and clover seed; hill selection of seed potatoes; proper selection and curing of seed corn; testing seeds of all kinds for purity and germination; the elimination of unproductive cows; the prevention of tuberculosis, contagious abortion and milk fever among the dairy herds; the study of market conditions; and the improved arrangement of field and farm buildings—these are only a few of the problems that must have attention on the average Michigan farm. The highest type of farm management exists only when the various farm enterprises are well selected and carefully organized and when the work is in the hands of an intelligent, careful and hard-working manager.

The farm management field, man or county agent is not expected to be an expert in all lines, but he will keep in close touch with the specialists of the state stations and of our department and will frequently call them to his aid in solving difficult problems. His special work will be the better organization of the farm and the selection of the most profitable enterprises for the farm and the locality, but the nature of his work and his position in the community will demand that he shall always be ready to lend a hand whenever and wherever he can be of service. The county agent will keep in touch with the public schools, and will encourage the teaching of nature study, elementary agriculture and domestic economy. He will take an active interest in the boys' and girls' club work, farmers' meetings and teachers' institutes, and do what he can toward the improvement of social conditions in rural communities.

The cost of employing a field man in a county varies from $2400 to $3000, including salary for agent, his traveling expenses, office room and equipment and all other necessary expenses. In most counties where this work is already started the county, the commercial clubs or some other organizations within the county have raised half the necessary funds and our department have provided the remainder. The work in all cases is outlined and directed by our office and the State Agricultural College. Our funds for the coming year are quite limited, though Congress has been fairly liberal in its appropriation for this work. We shall be pleased to consider co-operation with any county that will meet us half way, in so far as our funds will warrant. Some counties have been able to get assistance from other sources. We understand that a number of counties are receiving $1,000 each from the Council of Grain Exchanges of Chicago. The money is furnished to the county only when a county organization has been effected and enough funds raised to warrant co-operation.

If a part of the money is raised locally, part furnished by the Council of Grain Exchange, and the state will contribute its share toward this county work, it will not be necessary for us to furnish more than one-fourth of the funds required; and the less we put into each county the further our funds will extend. Some counties are raising all the necessary funds and asking us to supervise and direct the work. In such cases we are arranging to do this in co-operation with the state institution.

If we can eventually place one trained man in charge of this work in each county of the United States, this force of men should greatly improve the agriculture of this country, increase materially the net profits to the farmer, and decrease the cost of living in all parts of this country. Such work has been the salvation of agriculture in some European countries. It is just the experimental state here, and I sincerely believe that we are about to see a new era in agriculture.

Interstate Auto Road Projectors Meet in Grand Rapids for Organization.

Representatives of the Grand Rapids Association of Commerce and the Grand Rapids Automobile Club representative from the counties traversed by the Chicago-Mackinac automobile road will meet in Grand Rapids today to organize for this project.

It is expected that each county will report on the plan it has for road building in connection with the big automobile thoroughfare and now the county organizations are progressing.

Automobile men from South Bend and representatives of the Chicago Automobile Club will probably attend the meeting, as both these cities are interested in the road.

As soon as the organization gets in working order a survey of the proposed route of the road will be made.

MT. PLEASANT NORMAL

Offering Short Courses in Agriculture During the Winter Term.

The following courses are being given regularly during the winter term. It is thought that the Normal might be of greater service to the farming region by inviting all who are interested to attend:

1. General Agriculture, covering the fundamentals of soil, farm crops, fruit and stock.

2. Soils and Stocks, a special course doing extensive work, laboratory work on the physical nature of soils and soil testing, followed by a discussion of soil fertility, fertilizers and conservation of soil water. Our work in stock will be especially particular. As much time as possible will be spent on the stock farms, judging, discussing breeds and feeding. A number of practical talks will be given farmers by experts from Washington and M. A. C.

In addition to the two courses mentioned above one may take courses in history, literature, mathematics, physical training, wood work, etc.

Our regular tuition for all the courses is $5.00 for the term. Board and room may be secured at very reasonable rates.

W. C. T. U. Meeting.

The W. C. T. U. will meet Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Rinehart on Dixon avenue at 2:30 p. m. Readings on temperance in other lands and music.

Leaders: Mrs. F. M. Harris and Mrs. Fred Thomas.

The Courier wants potatoes on subscription.

Ironmonger.

The word "ironmonger" has as early an origin as any other word in the English language. It means literally an eater of iron and came to its present use in this way. There was once a law that forbade buying fish to sell again, and the fish hawkers, who still carried on their trade in spite of this law, were facetiously termed fish eaters or fish-mongers, for to evade the law their large purchases of fish were sold to be for their own consumption. Gradually the term monger was applied to other trades, as chess-monger, until at last it came to mean any middleman as distinguished from a manufacturer and so was applied to the dealer in hardware.—London Graphic.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

[From a series of elaborate chemical tests.]

Comparative digestibility of food made with different baking powders.

An equal quantity of bread (biscuit) was made with each of two kinds of baking powder—cream of tartar and alum—and submitted separately to the action of the digestive fluid, each for the same length of time.

The percentage of the food digested is shown as follows:

Bread made with Royal Cream of Tartar Powder:

99 Per Cent. Digested

Bread made with alum powder:

67 Per Cent. Digested

Royal Baking Powder raised food is shown to be of greatly superior digestibility and healthfulness.

A co-partnership was formed this week between J. E. Converse and A. G. Urquhart and from this out Mr. Urquhart will be found at the old Converse offices. The new firm will be known as Converse & Urquhart. This business arrangement should be a big success right from the start. The Converse law business has grown to such proportions that Mr. Converse has been unable to give each individual matter the attention that he desires but with the business arranged as it is now we anticipate a degree of success for the office that will be even greater than that of the past as from this out there will be an attorney in the office at all times and in the past the business has been such that Mr. Converse has been called away for several days at a time, while Mr. Urquhart's practice has been more local in nature. It can readily be seen that the partnership is an ideal one for both parties concerned as well as their clients.

Both of these gentlemen have a host of friends who will be greatly pleased to learn of the arrangement. This has nothing to do with the Converse Insurance Agency which will remain as in the past and Mr. Wilson, who has been assisting Mr. Converse will open a law and insurance office in East Jordan, with which Mr. Converse will be connected.—Boyne City Times.

WHAT BETTER ROADS BRING.

Values Increase, Population Grows and Social Conditions Improve.

In order to meet a popular demand for information on the subject of good roads the department of agriculture has issued as farmers' bulletin 505 a report prepared by the office of public roads entitled "Benefits of Improved Roads."

The various benefits of good roads may be grouped under two main subdivisions, dealing respectively with economic benefits and social benefits. It is apparent to any one who has studied road matters for a period of years that the advantages of improved public roads have been repeatedly proved beyond argument.

There is no case, says the bulletin where any community has ever regretted the improvement of its roads. When good roads reduce the cost of hauling adjacent land becomes more valuable. There is a corresponding tendency of population to increase and in its turn this tendency strengthens the demand for more good roads social conditions improve, and the life of the community is influenced in numerous ways. Where there are good roads the farm increases in value partly because the cost of hauling is decreased. The reduction may be

MARK STATE HIGHWAYS.

Telegraph Poles Painted to Indicate Various Routes.

C. Gordon Reed, state superintendent of highways of New York, has designated several utility highway routes of the state by colors for the guidance of motorists. This has been done in accordance with the suggestion of Frank D. Lyon, secretary of the New York State Automobile association.

Five routes have been designated, with colors, red, blue, yellow, green and brown respectively, and state highway employees have been appointed to begin marking the routes at once. Telegraph poles along the lines will be painted in colors by local automobile clubs and the state will paint the top rails of fences and bridge approaches.

Colored disks will designate routes through cities and towns and maps will be prepared showing the color scheme and outlines. Connecting routes will later be designated by combinations of colors.

STATE ROAD SUPERVISION.

The Duties of Such a "System"—Its Uses.

A state system of roads should be comprehensive in regard to the benefits conferred upon all parts of the state.

Efficient in regard to the character of the traffic upon them—

Continuous in regard to the various counties and cities which they would serve—

Uniform in regard to the types of construction and the standard of maintenance.

Local roads are governed by local conditions.

State roads should be governed only by the needs of the traffic placed upon them by the people of the state with out regard to any special locality.

State roads are for the use of all the people of the state, and as such should be built and maintained by the state.

Grange Column

Wilson Grange No. 719.

Wilson Grange met in regular session Saturday, December 28, 1912 with an attendance of 24 members and one visitor.

During the business session the members who were elected to fill the office of master, steward, chaplain and treasurer for the ensuing year, withdrew their names, and the following were elected to fill the vacancies.

Master, Robert Shepard; steward, E. L. Nowland; chaplain, Laura Hudson; treasurer, Clifford Brown; insurance director, E. S. Brintall.

After the business was over the members listened to an interesting program. The master announced that there would be installation of officers and supper next meeting. Grange closed to meet again in two weeks.

Ironton Grange.

Ironton Grange met in regular session December 31, Worthy Master Clark presiding.

After the usual order of business our candidate was instructed in the mysteries of the degrees.

Lecturer's hour consisted of songs, stories, recitations, readings and a report of the proceedings of state grange by Worthy Master Clark.

Next meeting, January 14, will be a day meeting. Meeting will call to order at ten o'clock in the forenoon. Dinner at noon. Open meeting and installation of officers in the afternoon. In the absence of the lecturer, Brother John Kindsen will act as lecturer. The program will consist of discussions on dairying and bean-growing by the brothers and garden work by the sisters. Every member can prepare to take part in the discussion. The younger members will be called upon for songs, recitations, etc.

Lodge Contests.

With the beginning of the year the fraternal orders of Charlevoix have gotten busy and attendance contests are the order.

The Knights of Pythias have a contest under way between the "Mustangs," Dick Lewis, captain, and the "Tigers," E. J. Miller, captain, and from now on fur will fly to see who furnishes the big feed at the end.

Not to be behind, the Odd Fellows got into the fray and arranged a contest between the "Blues" and the "Reds," captained by E. F. Vought and William Higman, respectively, and from now on a big feed is in prospect for them also in the springtime.

Prisoners Sentenced.

Judge Mayne today gave out the following sentences:

Guy E. King, wife desertion, one to three years in the State Reformatory at Ionia.

Ad Beers, the Boyne Valley man arrested a short time ago for a serious offense, drew a sentence of from one to ten years at Ionia. Ada, his wife, drew a sentence of from one to ten years at the Detroit House of Correction.

SCOTT IS CHOSEN

As President Pro Tem of the Senate—Given Place on Important Committees.

The legislature got down to business Thursday. Representative Gilbert A. Currie was elected speaker, by a strict party vote. Mr. Currie was one of the leaders in progressive legislation at the last session and the choice is generally recognized as a wise one.

In the Senate Lieutenant Governor Ross, called to order and the senate was organized by the election of Senator Frank D. Scott of this district as president pro tem, and Dennis E. Alward of Clare as clerk. Lieutenant Governor Ross announced his committees, Senator Scott being named on the following committees. Constitutional amendments; judiciary chairman; Traverse City asylum; Michigan Reformatory at Ionia; Normal College at Mt. Pleasant; public buildings; state library.

It is announced that the senator will probably be the Republican floor leader this session, which means that the interests of this district will be carefully guarded as we are one of the few senatorial districts in the state represented by a senator who has had previous experience.

AT AN EARLY AGE

Clarence VanDusen Dies Following an Operation for Appendicitis.

Clarence VanDusen, youngest son of Alfred and Mary VanDusen of Norwood, died at the Petoskey hospital Saturday, following an operation for appendicitis, aged 23 years, eight months and two days.

He was taken sick in camp at Gilchrist about two weeks ago and his physician advised him to go home. On arriving in this city, Dr. Armstrong advised him to go to Petoskey, where he was operated upon, but it was too late. His father and mother went with him, his mother and brother, Lawrence, staying with him until the last. Thursday night he was operated upon and there being no hope of recovery his brothers and sisters were sent for. He died trusting in Jesus.

He leaves to mourn his loss, besides his parents, three brothers and three sisters. The funeral was held from the Epworth church Tuesday, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating.

COOPER IS ELECTED

Board of Supervisors Chose Charlevoix man for Superintendent of the Poor.

The board of supervisors assembled Monday for the purpose of passing on the bonds of our new county officials and such other work as might come before the board. Up to this time the most important matter has been the election of a county superintendent of the poor, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Fred Smith. This was made a special order for yesterday afternoon and resulted in the election of Henry C. Cooper of this city.

The choice of Mr. Cooper is generally regarded as a wise one, as his long experience in public affairs and wide acquaintance throughout the county will prove of much value to the county in the duties of the position.

Do You Know Anything About CHIROPRACTIC

Chiropractic (Ki-ro-prak-tik) is the science of adjusting the subluxations (displacements) in the spinal column, commonly called the backbone, for the purpose of removing pressure from the nerves. The spinal column is the only place nerves pass between hard bony surfaces, that are MOVABLE, therefore, practically the only place nerves can be impinged or the nerve restricted, and it matters not what part of the body or organ is affected, the CAUSE is in the spinal column. I ask no questions, simply analyze the spine and I tell you every place you are affected. Chiropractic is the only science that REMOVES THE CAUSE of disease and is done without pain, drugs or knife. I use nothing but my hands. The whole object is accomplished when the nerve is released.

I do not TREAT, I remove the CAUSE, nature cures.

Analysis and Consultation free. Let me tell you where you are affected by analyzing your spine. Because it is new do not say "it is impossible."

I guarantee to cure any case I take charge of or it will cost you nothing. All I ask is a chance, and I will cure you of your trouble.

Big Meeting to Boom Lake Shore Highway Held at Muskegon.

WORK IS WELL UNDER WAY

Dr. A. M. Wilkinson Chosen as Vice-President From This County.

Another Road Proposed at Grand Rapids Meeting.
Dr. Armstrong and F. C. Burnett
Charlevoix's Vice-Presidents

The first road congress for the boosting of a lake shore roadway, fifteen feet wide from Chicago to the straits was held in Muskegon Thursday, delegates being present from all but two counties through which the proposed roadway will pass. The representatives from this county were Supervisors Gallagher, Lewis and Bashaw, who were elected by the board of supervisors at their session last week.

The meeting was called to order by Ex-Senator Holt of Muskegon and Frank Hamilton, the well known good roads booster of Traverse City, was elected chairman.

A big banquet was held Thursday night which was presided over by Lieutenant-governor Ross.

A. G. Bushnell of the Chicago Motor Club, was the first speaker. Mr. Bushnell said he represented a very live organization of 1,500 members, and continuing further, said: "I want to impress upon you what it would mean to have a great highway through the state from South Bend through to Mackinac. If we had such a road from South Bend the motorists of Chicago, the south and the southwest, would in a few years, directly or indirectly, add hundreds of thousands, nay millions, to the value of Western Michigan. It is not so much the money they would spend at the hotels and garages and the little articles of clothing picked up along the way, or the souvenirs which are purchased, but there is brought home to the tourist a visible tangible knowledge of your splendid climate, your beautiful lakes and rivers, and more than all else, the realization that Oregon and Washington have nothing on you in the matter of apple orchards, and contrary to the general belief, Michigan can produce something besides Jack rabbits."

Other speakers were Frank Hamilton of Traverse City, trustee of the State Good Roads association; Paul R. Beardsley, president of the Muskegon chamber of commerce; secretary John I. Gibson of the Western Michigan Development bureau, and Dr. William DeKleine of Grand Haven.

The following resolution contains the gist of the object of the meeting:

"Whereas the building of inter-county or continuous lines of highway throughout the state should receive encouragement and the co-operation of each and every locality through which such main lines will pass; and

"Whereas, this convention of delegates of supervisors, highway commissioners and officials from the several counties assembled in the city of Muskegon for the purpose of stimulating road building in Western Michigan and the further development of the entire western coast; do hereby resolve that as a means to the end desired, and that both local and general benefits of good roads may be secured the co-operation of the several townships and counties along the shore from the Indiana line to the Straits of Mackinaw be requested to connect and build, at the earliest time possible, all pieces of unimproved and unfinished roads along the designated route making one continuous line of improved highway along the scenic route of Western Michigan, from the extreme southern limit to the Straits of Mackinaw, passing through Muskegon, Ludington, Manister, Traverse City, Charlevoix and Petoskey."

A large number of miles already built along the proposed line was surprising. Only five counties in the entire district are not now operating under the county road system, and in these counties they are considering favorably the adoption of the county road law. They are now building under the township road system.

Officers were elected, which include a vice-president from every county, and they were authorized to select two others to cooperate with them to secure the desired end, Dr. A. M. Wilkinson being chosen from this county.

The official name of the movement will be the Western Michigan Lake Shore Highway.

The meeting held at Grand Rapids Wednesday to boost the project for an auto road through Michigan resulted in the formation of an association known as the Chicago-Grand Rapids-Mackinaw Boulevard association. The proposed route is from Chicago east, passing through Kalamazoo; thence north through Grand Rapids to the straits.

The meeting broke into two factions over the proposed route north of Grand Rapids, one faction desiring the proposed road to run by way of Grand Rapids and Muskegon while the route as decided upon will run through Howard City, Big Rapids, Reed City, Cadillac, Traverse City, Charlevoix, Petoskey and Mackinaw City.

The officers elected were: President, Dr. F. C. Warnshuis of Grand Rapids; secretary, M. C. Huggett, Grand Rapids; treasurer, Carl Mathew, Grand Rapids. The vice-presidents elected from this county were Dr. R. B. Armstrong of this city and F. C. Burnett of Bay Shore.

The road proposed above has no connection with the West Michigan Lake Shore driveway except that both the proposed roads will pass through this city.

QUESTION OF CHARTER REVISION

Discussed by R. W. Kane at Meeting of Men's Bible Class.

Next Sunday's Meeting Will be Addressed by Superintendent of Schools Northon.

The meeting of the Men's Bible class Sunday was taken up by a talk on charter revision by R. W. Kane. Mr. Kane gave an exposition of the law governing cities of this class and the steps necessary to secure a revision of their charters. He stated that from his experience in the affairs of the city, and study of the question, he was convinced that a change was necessary in our plan of municipal government. Mr. Kane then gave what he considered would be changes for the better. While the commission form of government had been very successful in larger cities than ours, he doubted whether it was the best for cities of this size. In brief he would have a mayor and city council, as now, and would have them the only elective officers. He would have these officials elected from the city at large and for a term of three years, one third to be elected each year. He then would place the management of the business affairs of the city in the hands of a business manager, to be elected by the council; this official would be held responsible for the proper conduct of the business of the city.

Taken altogether it was a very interesting meeting and furnished much food for thought as the matter of revising our city charter will soon come before the people.

The meeting next Sunday will be addressed by Superintendent of Schools Northon.

WILL BEGIN NEXT WEEK

State Farmers' Institutes One Day
Meetings in This Vicinity.

Grand Round-Up in Charlevoix Wednesday and Thursday, January 29-30.

Programs are being rapidly arranged for the state farmers' institutes which open in this county next week with one day meetings at East Jordan, Boyne City, Boyne Falls and Bay Shore, followed by the round-up in this city January 29 and 30.

O. F. Marvin of Holt, is the conductor. Mr. Marvin has had several years' experience in institute work and will discuss "Tillage and Crop Rotations," "Corn and Corn Silage," "Poultry on the Farm," "Good Roads and Alfalfa."

Another speaker will be N. I. Moore of Hanover, who is one of the most popular lecturers on the institute staff. Mr. Moore's subjects will be "The Dairy Cow" and "Handling the General Farm."

For our fruit growers Rev. A. Bentall has been secured. Mr. Bentall is new in institute work but has rapidly gone to the front rank, calls for him are coming from all sections.

Another special feature will be an address by G. L. Codman, cement expert, on the use of concrete on the farm. Mr. Codman is sent out by the cement manufacturers and has his subject thoroughly in hand.

As usual, special arrangements have been made for the Women's Congress, which will be in charge of Miss Jennie Buell, lecturer of the Michigan State grange and one of the most popular women lecturers in the state. Members of the county normal class will also take part in the program.

Full programs and places of meeting will be published next week.

ENGAGEMENT ANNOUNCED

Of Popular Charlevoix Young Lady at Afternoon Party Friday Afternoon.

Miss Etta O'Neill entertained sixteen girls Friday afternoon in honor of Miss Caro Neech, the occasion being the announcement of the engagement of Miss Neech and Glenn Warren of Petoskey.

The house was most beautifully decorated in pink and white sweet peas and hearts, pink paper hearts best fastened from corner to corner and draped over the curtains. The table was a daisy of pink and white sweet peas, the same color scheme being carried out in everything including the refreshments and dishes in which they were served. The announcement cards, white hearts painted with pink sweet peas, came as a pleasant surprise.

A very enjoyable time was the verdict of the guests who wish Miss Neech all happiness throughout life.

ANNUAL MEETING HELD TUESDAY

Of The Stockholders of The Charlevoix
State Savings Bank.

No Changes in Board of Directors—Probable Changes in Officials.

The annual stockholder's meeting of the Charlevoix State Savings Bank, was held last Tuesday and Directors H. S. Harsha, John Burns, J. L. Crane, P. D. Campbell and W. J. Rachow were re-elected to succeed themselves, there being no changes made in the directors.

The board has not yet had their first meeting for organization and election of officers for the new year but in speaking with Cashier Rachow he stated that there was some probable change to be made this year in the officers, owing to the fact that former Vice-President, G. C. Geiken, is now away at Gloucester, Massachusetts, fishing and not available as a director or officer. R. P. Foley, who has been the estimable president and chairman of the board for a number of years, has erected a large new hotel at Winter Park, Florida, and acquired other large interests in the south and proposes to take out his residence in the state of Florida, and hereafter will be in Charlevoix, only a short time in the summer. In view of this, Mr. Foley, and the board, think it best to have some other director living in Charlevoix, elected to the office of president and chairman of the board who can give to the affairs of the bank more time and attention.

Whatever changes are made in the organization of the board will not change the policy of the bank or its management. Cashier Rachow, under whose direct management the bank has built up its business to the present high standard and increased its clientele, will be the active officer and its customers will be taken care of as heretofore.

The natural growth of the Charlevoix State Savings Bank is but the result of an aggressive policy with the ability to care for the largest borrowers and depositors—funds for the former, security and interest for the latter, and a broad-gauged policy of meeting customers in a liberal manner in every particular.

Sale is Extended.

After a careful consideration in this matter we have decided to continue our clean sweep sale until January 24th. We do not often extend the date of our sales from the date given in the first place, but we have received many requests from our customers to extend our sale for another week and we decided to do so. People realize that when we advertise a sale it means many dollars saved to purchasers. We have no mercy on goods or prices and we simply cut them in two, selling our goods for one-half former price.

We have sold a lot of goods during this sale and you can rest assured there is a big group of bargains still on hand. We have 20 men's suits and five men's overcoats left and they will be closed out at the regular sale price of $10.00 each. Not one of these garments are worth less than from $20.00 up to $25.00, and best of all we stand behind every garment we sell. If they don't give satisfactory wear we will take them back and give you new goods in their place free of cost to you. We urge everybody that has not availed themselves of this great opportunity to get some real good snappy bargains, to do it now, this being your last chance until next fall.

After this sale is over we will redecorate our store and prepare for the arrival of our spring goods which are on the way now. We intend installing some more hand-some door cases and when everything is in place there will be no question but that the Palace Clothing House will be the finest clothing house for men and boys in northern Michigan. It is today the very best in the county.—Adv. 311

BURNED TO DEATH

Mrs. Catherine Burshaw, Aged Resident of Burt
Lake, Meets Death in Flames.

Burned beyond recognition in a fire which consumed the log cabin that had been her home for a great many years, was the fate of Mrs. Catherine Burshaw, 83 years old, who lived near Burt Lake, north of Petoskey, Thursday afternoon. The fire also destroyed the home of Mrs. Burshaw's daughter, Mrs. Madeline Kniff.

Shortly after Mrs. Kniff had carried her mother's supper to her, flames were discovered hurrying through the chinks between the cabin logs by men employed at the place. They forced the door and rushed in to save the aged occupant, but the heat drove them back. The daughter, frantic with grief, repeatedly tried to battle the flames, but her efforts, too, were futile, and she was compelled to stand by as the flames which were cremating her mother communicated to her own house and reduced it to ashes. When the fire eventually subsided, a search was made of the ruins and the aged woman's body was found. The property damage of the fire is estimated at $1,000.

LAKE MICHIGAN CAN'T BE USED

Chicago Not Allowed by United States to Increase Water Supply.

Wat Secretary Says He Hasn't Power to Deal With Windy City's Health Question.

Secretary of War Stimson has decided adversely on Chicago's application to increase the diversion of water from Lake Michigan through the drainage canal for sanitary purposes. He says he lacks authority to grant the petition and takes the position that he cannot deal with questions affecting the health of Chicago unless this authority be extended by congress.

The attitude of the secretary makes it evident that Chicago will be prevented from carrying out the sewage disposal system requiring 10,000 cubic feet of Lake Michigan water a second. Whether it will be deprived of the 1,167 cubic feet now officially permitted and compelled to close down the drainage canal is a question that has occurred to some of the representatives of that city.

It is unlikely, however, that the secretary's decision will disturb the existing permit, although it may incite a court attack on the ground taken by Mr. Stimson. Chicago is deemed to have a valid claim to the present amount of diversion because it has been permitted for more than a decade.

THIRTEENTH BIRTHDAY

Miss Beason Bartlett Entertains a Number of Friends Friday Night.

Friday night Beason Bartlett entertained a number of friends in honor of her thirteenth birthday. The occasion was also the birthday of John S. Akert so a joint celebration was held. Those present were: The Misses Ruth and Bessie Hamlet, Beatrice Harrington, Charlotte Thomas, Lela Gennet, Narva Cooper, Katharine Harsha, Effie See, Hildah Anderson, Hilda Glassford, Horatia Iddings, Addie Holley, Beason Bartlett, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Akert, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Slaght, and M. L. Anderson.

The evening was spent in dancing and playing games and a general good time which is always a feature of every affair which takes place at the Bartlett. Not the least amusing and entertaining feature of the evening was the antics of a pair of Brownies.

SEVENTH ANNUAL BANQUET HELD

At the Home of Honorable John Nicholls
Wednesday Evening.

OF SHAKESPEARE STUDY CLUB

Most Successful in the History of the Program Rendered Was One of the Best and Most Amusing of any Ever Given—Most Pleasant Social Event.

On Wednesday evening of last week the seventh annual banquet of the Shakespeare Study club was held at the residence of Hon. John Nicholls. This is one of the leading social affairs of our city and the event this year was no exception to the previous enjoyable banquets held by the club.

A table eight by sixteen feet, laid in the spacious dining room with covers for twenty-four, was tastefully decorated, the color scheme being red and green. An eight course dinner was served and judging from the fact that the plates were brought in filled and carried away empty, the menu was all that could be desired.

The following literary program was one of the best and most amusing rendered on any of these happy occasions.

GOES TO NORTHWEST

East Jordan Real Estate Man Will Boost Charlevoix County in New Field.

W. A. Loyeday, who for some years past has been boosting in the real estate business in this city, has been offered and has accepted a traveling position for a few weeks in the Northwest, and after February 1st expects for a time to be absent from the city. His real estate office, however, will not be closed, but will be looked after in his absence by R. A. Brintnall, who is something of a master himself, and will put in the time there afternoons and evenings. As we mentioned last week the insurance department of Mr. Loyeday's business has been transferred to the Wilson & Converse Law and Insurance company, who will open an office over the State Bank of East Jordan. Mr. Loyeday expects to keep boosting for East Jordan and Charlevoix county while he is on the road, and be back to his post in a few weeks with a bunch of buyers lined up for the purchase of city farm and resort property in this vicinity.—East Jordan Enterprise.

Organize for Campaign.

The local option campaign in Emmet county was begun Thursday when the members of the county committee met in Petoskey to organize.

It was decided to raise $1,500 to keep Emmet county dry. The matter of electing officers was left to a committee, in order that the best possible men for the work might be selected.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER XI. With a Great Price.

JOHN was standing at the window of his courthouse office. The sense of loneliness was upon him again. It may be that the sight of Katherine Hammon sauntering down Main street in company with a bearded summer gentleman had something to do with his mood.

Then another vision was accorded him—a fat white horse lazily drawing an ancient top buggy in which sat Senator Murchell, for all the world a prosperous farmer passing into age amid peace and plenty.

credulous. He went to the window, staring out wonderingly. He saw a strange thing—Jeremy Applegate stumbling across the square and pausing under the flag, looking up. The veteran's hand rose, as though in salute; then, arrested midway, it fell limply, and Jeremy marched on.

John pointed. "There, senator, is one who entered the service of your institution. Now he is a broken spirited old man with just enough soul left to be ashamed. If I became part of your machine, in the end I'd become like that—different in size perhaps, but the same in kind. I," he said, quietly, "prefer your enemy; it's safer. You represent an institution. I stand for a principle, a fundamental principle. You can smash John Dummendo—oh, very easily, no doubt. But Senator Murchell, you can't smash the principle!"

The senator did not often permit himself the luxury of losing his temper, but he was exceedingly close to it just then. The friendship he had offered to a young man whom he liked strangely well had been contemptuously rejected, and the hurt was all the deeper because he had broken the rule of a lifetime to make the offer. He carefully waited until the emotion had subsided before speaking.

"It's a good deal simpler to state a principle than to follow it in practice. And you can't judge politics by one year's experience. However—"

He stopped long enough to put on his hat. "You went out of your way to denounce me. You took a time when I'm needing friends to do it, too. In spite of that I made you an offer in good faith. If there's anything in you I'd have given you the chance to prove it."

"I," he concluded, and he spoke as of some divine edict, fixed and immutable, "I rarely offer friendship to those who fight me—never twice."

He went out.

The East ridge colony was going scattering its charmed bread-crumbs from Lakewood to Bar Harbor. Only the Haggardens were left, and they were soon to depart. Katherine and her mother to go abroad for the latter's health—which, to be sure, was so good as to be worth preserving. John and Haig had arranged to mate together one September evening their farewell pilgrimage to the ridge.

That evening John spent a great deal of care over his toilet.

He drove to the home of Silas Hicks, where Haig, wisely avoiding the hospitality of the hotel, had his rooms. Somewhat to his dismay, he was informed that Haig had discovered some mysterious errand requiring his attention, had departed a half hour earlier and had left word that he would later meet John at their Mecca.

"That's funny," muttered John as he drove away. He strongly suspected the validity of Haig's errand and debated seriously the advisability of turning back and sending his farewells by note, pleading as excuse for his non-appearance some unexpected business matter. He solemnly assured himself that he was a fool, both for having dallied with unhappiness all summer and for going now on a journey that could only intensify futile longings.

He sustained the indictment by continuing his journey. When he found Katherine, they strolled, Katherine chatting unconcernedly, to a seat in a retired corner of the grounds—only the fact would not have been significant to John—where she had sat so long after her talk with Warren Blake. She leaned back in one end of the seat. He sat at the other, as far away from her as he could, half facing her. She was not really beautiful—her features were too firm for that—yet even another than John might have been excused for thinking her so in the softening light of the rising moon. Only her eyes, softly lustrous in the pale light, marked her suppressed excitement.

"Do you realize," she said, "this is the first time we've been alone this summer? You have really managed it very awkwardly." As though she had not done all the managing!

He had nothing to say.

"Am I such an actress, or have you been afraid that I'd propose to you again?"

"I haven't been fool enough to take that seriously," he said quickly. "And I'm old enough to know the danger of playing with fire. At least," he added, "I ought to have known it."

He could not help thinking of the months to come when, with less engrossing tasks to take his mind from the ache, he must renew the loneliness grown more poignant of the last winter. He wondered now at his weakness in letting himself, despite his knowledge of her and of what she meant to him, be drawn again within the circuit of her charm.

He became aware that she was speaking, with that amazing courage which was always hers.

"I am sorry," she said. "But I haven't been fair to you. The things father works for are what appeal to me, not the things you dream of. The prestige, the power, the knowledge that I belong to the men who are conquering, not dreams or ideals, count with me. It isn't very pretty, is it, from your point of view? But it's true. I—I could wish it were different. Last summer it was different. I was trying to decide what I wanted. I—I have always been more or less in love with you ever since I can remember. And I saw you were beginning to care for me, to make you believe that I could have you and the rest. And I don't greatly blame myself for that. Because I am a woman must I sit passively by and wait for hapfulness to come? I was drifting between a minute later came a knock at his door. "Come!" he said.

The senator entered. "Afternoon, John."

"What can I do for you?"

"Humph! Don't seem very glad to see me. You might ask me to sit down."

John pointed to a chair. "Why hesitate? It's your courthouse, isn't it?"

"Understood you'd taken a mortgage on it yourself lately," Murchell sat down, looking genially at John.

"So you think I'm a bad man and a disgrace to the state?" the senator inquired at last.

"Well, just about that," John said quickly.

"Toid Miss Roberta I'm a bad man; didn't you?"

"I could have said that you are a shameful force in politics; that you have exploited a great party and the ignorance of the people; that you have built up a machine for the sole purpose of looting the state; that you have got and held power by compelling public servants to use the influence of their office to perpetuate your machine and by buying the votes of the corruptible. There's probably a lot more. If I only knew it. I've never heard that you used your power for any good thing. Without profession or business you are a rich man. How?"

"Humph!" granted Murchell, who had listened without display of feeling. "Doesn't mean much. You'd have hard work proving any of it."

They relapsed into silence. John looked out of the window, awaiting in cold silence the senator's next words. Murchell preserved his usual impassive front. It was not the first time he had encountered the intolerance of youth. But never before, save during the Sheehan trial, had the intolerance pierced the crust of the man.

He broke the silence. "What do you want to do?"

"A good many things you wouldn't understand—principally, I suppose, to smash you and your organization. That probably sounds funny to you."

Murchell did not laugh. He merely felt pity for an impractical young dreamer.

"You can't smash the organization."

"It must be smashed, because it exists to deprive the people of the right of self-government."

"A pretty phrase. It's common sense politics. The people don't want to govern themselves—they can't. They need some one to take the burden from them. How are you going to smash us?"

"It may be simpler than you think, Senator Murchell. When the people understand what you are they'll smash you."

The other smiled pityingly. "You think because you've sent a few poor devils to jail you're a man of destiny."

"You've gone out of your way to attack me. You're a fool."

don't you? You think I'm merely a wicked old fellow who's got power and is using it for his own selfish ends. If I were just that you could smash me. But I'm more than that. I'm an institution—a part of a necessary institution, one that society, that property, that business, can't get along without. You can smash William Murchell—that is, put some one in his place. But you can't smash the institution. And you can't judge a system by its incidental errors."

John smiled, not very happily. "I've heard that before. The weakness of your argument is that the errors seem to be essential. Government isn't, or shouldn't be, merely a matter of force, nor exist only as the servant of property, even if all you say is true. And I've got to go on."

"And where'll you come out?"

"I? You will try to break me. You may succeed. But you will observe that I have little to lose. If I lose much—you won't understand this—I hope I'd lose it gladly."

"Did I say I was going to break you?" Murchell demanded testily. "I came here today to suggest that you come out for Wash Jenkins' seat in congress."

John's reply was almost bitter. "So I have impressed you as a hypocrite trying to get kicked up out of the way I repeat, I'm not for sale."

Murchell suddenly rose and put a heavy hand on John's shoulder. "You said you have little to lose. You have much—o future. You've gone out of your way to attack me. You're a fool. But I—I like you, man. And I'd like to save that future for you."

For a moment John stared at him. In two words, but—struggling against it, of course—toward you. Do you know it's your fault I didn't drift further? You wouldn't take me. You made a mistake the night of that rally, being so foolish in your notions of a poor man's honor. You ought to have taken me in your arms and made me go to you. I should have gone—gladly—faithfully too. But you wouldn't."

He listened unresponsive to her words that, halting sometimes, fell in low, measured tones with a curious, underlying regretfulness.

"Now it is too late. I've had time to think, to weigh you against the other things. Last winter taught me how much they mean to me. And I find you—wanting. This summer has not changed that. What you ask costs too much."

"I ask nothing."

"True! I forget—you ask nothing. Last summer you need not have asked."

"You can't make me want you enough."

You will do me the credit to remember that I ask you nothing that would cost more than you are willing to pay."

"That isn't true," he said in sudden roughness. "You—it is why I'm a fool for having come near you are tempting me with every word you speak."

"Am I tempting you, I wonder?" Her voice became uncertain. "I'd beg you to believe that I haven't meant it—to remember that I shouldn't be good for you. I have no wish to be a delusion."

The tremor in her voice set him to trembling. Then, without conscious intention, he was holding her in a close, rough clasp and crying to her to go with him. She did not resist, and she did not respond. She lay inert in his arms, passively suffering his hot kisses, her eyes closed, her face white.

"My dear, my dear! Don't you see? You're fighting against the thing that means your happiness. I'm not afraid to ask now, for I know I can give you far more than you'll ever have otherwise. What I want to do isn't so terrible. It is very simple. I can't see why a few are so strongly against it. And it doesn't mean the sacrifice you think. Already it has brought victory and the consideration of men you so much desire. In the end, if we have the spirit to fight and wait—"

His stammering phrases halted. He became aware of her closed eyes, her unresponsiveness. She opened her eyes and looked at him. His rough clasp relaxed. She shook her head and pushed herself away, leaning back in the seat.

"Ah," she murmured. "It is too late! You can't make me want you enough."

"It isn't too late if you care—"

"Is caring everything? You know it isn't. If it were you wouldn't make conditions. You would use your brains your talents, to work out a career. You would have accepted Senator Murchell's offer."

"You think that?" he cried. "Then you don't care!"

"Ah," she said resentfully. "You can say that? Do you think I could unsex myself as I have done for you for a fancy? I—I—but you wouldn't understand. It is a very practical matter. Life isn't all moonlight. It is all too beautiful to give one's life to an ideal. And you're very splendid now in the flush of your first victory. You would be still splendid fighting a battle, but the fight while you were young, but when you were a broken down, middle-aged failure, cast aside, a career out of the question, do you think that I wouldn't be romantic then. I'd be always looking up at the men I once knew, the men who were conquering, doing big things, and I'd regret. And I'd hate you then."

"It seems," he cried bitterly, "I inspire little confidence. I'm told by every one before I have tried long, while I am still whining, that I'm doomed to be a failure."

"Now it is you who will not see." She became more gentle. "Do you think I could care for a weakling? It isn't you we distrust, but your ideal. I know more of politics than I did a year ago. Your dream will get you only disappointment. Even the big men who have done the fine, good things for this country used the forces they found at hand, compromised with evil to create good. And their good stands."

Suddenly she leaned toward him and placed a hand on his arm. "Look, John," she pointed to the north star gleaming mildly in the moonlight. "That star is beautiful, but it is very, very high. Can't you understand? Ask me to go with you to the mountain top."

WANT CLEAN STREETS.

City Government of Alameda, Cal., to Enforce Laws.

If the sidewalk area and vacant lots of Alameda, Cal., are not always free from weeds and refuse it will not be the fault of the city government, as the city council will adopt an ordinance stringent and far-reaching in its provisions. The measure was prepared by City Attorney A. P. St. Sure at the request of Councilman F. L. Kramb, chairman of the street committee.

The ordinance, which was adopted by the committee of the whole of the council, provides that if property owners, after being duly notified, do not clean away weeds and refuse, as well as dilapidated fences, the work will be performed by the city street department and expense made a lien on the property. City Attorney St. Sure gave it as his opinion that this ordinance can be strictly enforced.

One of our exchanges truly says: "A hen can't plow, hoe cotton or split wood, but she can get there just the same. She does not cost more than a drink of whiskey and a plug of tobacco, but she can pay eight per cent interest on $25 in a year and pay her board besides. The fellow who thinks a hen can't make money doesn't know much about her. Take an old speckled hen that has no raising at all; one that has been thrown out of the corn crib, knocked off the porch with a broom and chased out of the garden by a worthless pup, just take that sort of a hen and she will pay expenses and clear about $23 a year if she's half way looked after."

SWEET CLOVER

Mrs. Minnie Hall, of Califa, California, writes as follows: "I have sweet clover as good for pasturing cows as alfalfa? How many pounds are usual for sowing per acre?"

There are many farmers who have good sweet clover pastures, and seem to be getting fair results from this crop for that purpose, but as a general thing, it is considered a noxious weed. Stock will eat sweet clover when they have become accustomed to it, but due to a slight bitterness, it is not usually relished as much as other clovers. We have known of instances where, after the stock had become accustomed to sweet clover, they seemed to eat it readily and do very well on it. In comparison with alfalfa as a feed for live stock, alfalfa is far superior. Alfalfa must be pastured very carefully, because the cattle are apt to bloat from eating it, especially in the fall of the year or early spring. A much more satisfactory method is to cut the alfalfa and feed it as a soiling crop, or to cure it and feed it as hay. Experience shows that one will get a great deal more feed out of alfalfa if handled this way than if the stock are allowed to graze the alfalfa.

A FREE BOOK

"The Story of Bread," an interesting little book, issued by the I. H. C. Service Bureau, Chicago, will be mailed free to any person who asks for it. This story is being used in hundreds of schools for supplementary reading, and in a pleasant way it makes plain why bread is called "the staff of life"—what plenty of good wheat bread has done for the progress of the world.

A big illustrated lecture, "The Dawn of Plenty," with colored views and motion pictures, grew out of the main theme of "The Story of Bread." This lecture is being presented before schools, colleges, chautauques, and other gatherings.

CLOVER

We have often called attention to the fact that every farmer should whenever sowing grass of any kind include some of the varieties of clover. If you expect to use your land for meadow purposes then one of the larger varieties, viz., the Mammoth Red or Common Red clover would probably serve your purpose best. If you expect to use the land both for pasture and for hay, the Alsike clover will serve your purpose best. While on the other hand, if you expect to pasture the land, then we would recommend a combination of Alsike and White clover.

There are several ways in which one can obtain a stand of clover. The first under consideration is to sow blue clover and timothy with winter wheat, sowing them at the same time during the last part of September. Clover should not be sown at this time, however, provided you are particularly anxious to obtain a stand of clover sown in the fall will winter kill very badly under normal conditions and for this reason it is not advisable to sow clover during the fall of the year. With timothy it may be sown with the wheat at the same time, either sowing the seed in front of the drill or by sowing the seed first and drilling the wheat later, then covering it by the use of the regular harrow. The clover may be sown just before it freezes up in the winter, but we do not recommend this practice, because of the uncertainty of the weather, but prefer waiting until spring to sow the clover seed. During the latter part of February or the first of March, just before the spring thaw has begun and when the land is in a rough and frozen condition is the best time to add the clover seed. The heavy duty in freezing and thawing will cover the seed sufficient under most conditions. However, if the land is sandy this practice might not be successful and we do not recommend it but on the other hand if your soil contains a large amount of clay you could expect success by following this method.

Another way of sowing timothy and clover but one which requires a little more judgment on the part of the farmer is to sow the wheat in the fall and add the clover and timothy in the spring after the land has thawed and the surface become dry. The plan is to sow the clover and timothy combined at this time by using a peg tooth harrow, which not only covers the seed but cultivates the wheat at the same time. The timothy will not show up with the first season, but you ought to get a good crop of clover and the timothy will come on later.

Either of the latter two methods ought to give you fairly good returns. If you expect to leave this field seeded down for any length of time it would be a good plan to add two or three pounds of bluegrass seed when sowing the timothy.

SHALL I PLOW OR DISK?

George Duncan Tilley, Alberta writes as follows: "Refering to your ad. in Calgary Herald about giving advice on crops, etc., I should like to have your suggestions on some points. On prairie soil broken for the first time in the fall of 1911, I have harvested forty-nine acres of wheat and forty acres of corn. The land was plowed five inches deep. In preparing the land for next year's crop, do you think that disking the stubble would be sufficient, or should the land be plowed? What crops should follow wheat and oats?"

As a general practice, the land should be plowed once a year unless there are unusual climatic conditions. If there had been practically no rain and the ground was very loose, you might get satisfactory results by only disking. However, it has been the mistake of a great many in the northwestern territory to think that they could raise satisfactory crops without doing the amount of work on the land that they should do. The result has been that in many places they have worn the land out much more rapidly than was necessary. It is advisable not to begin the practice of only disking. Better try plowing again.

You will perhaps not need to plow the ground any deeper than it was plowed last year, but ordinarily the result will warrant your doing this by leaving a part of your ground and only disking it, and if you do we would be very pleased to know the result.

One of the drawbacks to Canadian farming is a lack of system of crop rotation. By all means plan on a rotation of crops, which will include wheat, oats, and barley, and some leguminous crop. This may be clover, alfalfa, Canadian field peas, or some other similar crop that will do well in your specific locality. If you can grow corn, it would be well to include this in your rotation.

We have mailed to you, under separate cover a copy of our booklet "For Better Crops" and assure you that you will not be able to spend your evenings to better advantage than in reading this book carefully. We would call your attention especially to the first article by Professor Hopkins, who is the most noted authority on soil fertilization.

Yours very truly,
I. H. C. SERVICE BUREAU
KEEPING SHREDDED FODDER

W. W. Greiner, Orange, Virginia, writes as follows: "I am using a McCormick husker and shredder this fall, but have no storage room for fodder. My plan is to stack it outside, but have been advised that there is great danger of losing it if stacked outside, and I cannot afford to lose it. Can you advise me how to stack it so it will keep? I can neither bale it nor build a storage room this fall." Should fodder be kept either outdoors or inside, depending on local conditions. If you have a great deal of wet weather during the fall and winter, much of the shredded fodder will spoil, as is the case with rough feed stacked outdoors. There will be more waste to the shredded fodder than with the hay because of the fact that it is finer and not as easily handled as hay. In sections of the corn belt the shredded fodder is stacked outdoors, but very seldom is this done excepting where it is possible to put it under cover. We would advise that you use some cover, say to top the stack, and thus prevent some of the loss due to weather.

The only danger of stacking shredded fodder or putting in the barn results from the fact that it is shredded when very damp or wet. In no case should fodder be shredded during a damp rainy day because it will absorb the moisture very rapidly, and if stored when in this condition is very apt to spoil. We have known of instances where shredded fodder has burned up caused by instantaneous combustion due to the fact that it was shredded when too wet, or during a wet period of weather.

If you could stack your shredded fodder against one side of the barn, and provide a board roof for it, and at the same time have it convenient to where you expect to feed it, you would not lose a great deal by stacking it outdoors.

Adirondack.

The word "Adirondack" comes to us from the language of the Mohawks. With them it was the deer-dog and meant wood eaters. This term was applied to deer to a few members of a once powerful branch of the Algonquians, who were defeated by the Iroquois and forced to seek refuge in a fastness of the mountains. They were in great distress, and it is said they sent messengers to their victors asking them to make no further war upon them, as they were reduced to the necessity of eating roots and the bark of trees. A few of them finally escaped to the north, and others were captured and held in slavery by the Mohawks.

"Papa, what is a safety match?" Mr. Fleuspeck looking carefully to see if his wife is within earshot: "A safety match, my son, is when a bald-headed man marries an armless woman."—Illustrated Bits.

THE FARMER AND THE BANKER

Interesting Article by B. F. Washburn in Michigan Farmer.

Gives Many Reasons Why Banks Are of Benefit to Progressive Farmers.

The farmers throughout the country are yearly recognizing the advantages that our splendid American banking system affords and, to their credit and interest, a good share of them deal mostly through this financial medium. There is no business in the land that is conducted more on the lines of sound, reliable principles than the banks, which afford the same confidential respect and safeguards for one and all. Of course, there is occasionally a bank officer who goes wrong and causes great embarrassment, and sometimes a loss, to the other officers, stockholders and depositors. But usually in such cases the press exaggerates this to the limit, thus causing many to look on the banks as unsafe, while as a matter of fact, there are fewer losses from this source than any other investment we could make. For instance, 90 per cent of all business investments fail and when it comes to farmers there are enough of them also; but seldom do we hear of a bank failing, and then there is seldom a total loss.

If you want good business advice go to your banker, and he will give it to you. He will instruct you along the lines of honest business principles, and you will seldom make mistakes in following his directions. Just because there happens to be a member of a banking institution whom you do not like, or may not be just what he ought to be, perhaps, do not turn down the bank, as one member does not constitute a bank.

The advantages which the banks afford for the farmers are many and, from the commercial or business standpoint, it would be impossible to get along without them. Bradstreet's and Dun's, our great commercial rating agencies, are dependent largely on the banks for their information, and no doubt the day will come when every business farmer will have a commercial rating the same as other business men. Then he can send his check on his local bank as far away as he chooses for whatever he may wish to order. In fact, this is done now to some extent and here is one of the advantages of having a bank account. Your banker, if you have always dealt honestly and squarely with him, will be glad to recommend you to any business house on request.

Doing business with the bank elevates the farmer to more accurate business methods. It also systematizes the keeping of all his accounts. If you check out every dollar you handle during the year the banker has practically kept your books for you free of charge, and you know exactly to the penny how your business stands. This alone is worth much to the farmer.

No matter how small our deposits are, the bank appreciates them as well as the larger ones, consequently do not wait for once money to amount to an account. There are thousands of dollars lost, stolen and burned up every month in the year by people's carelessness in having too much money lying idle in their homes or on their persons, while if it was deposited in the local bank it would be perfectly safe. I sold a farmer some corn a few years ago. He paid me the cash, which I carelessly placed in my pocket. I was busy working around in the barnyard and when night came I had lost the cash. Now how much better it would have been for me had this farmer paid by check. If the check had been lost the money would have been in the bank and I could have obtained another check. I thought this was a lesson, but not long ago I lost some cash in about the same manner, which has taught me a lesson, and when I take in money after this I will send it in the bank immediately and pay all my bills by check. If I lose my check book I can get another.

When you pay your bills by check you never have to get a receipt, as the check is a receipt which the bank returns to you. You can also refer to these vouchers in years to come in case of a dispute in settlement of estates, etc. Should they be lost the transaction is recorded on the bank books and you can refer to them. Also, when you pay your bills by check you always have the right change, which is no small item.

When you are in need of groceries you naturally go to the grocery store. When you want money, go to the bank. Many think it is better to borrow money from individuals and shun the bank. This is making a mistake, because you cannot always get the amount you want or when you want it. But if you are known at your bank and have good credit you can get any amount at any time and only have to pay interest on some for the time you need the loan. Many times you have an opportunity to make a profitable investment by having some cash to invest in some good deal before you, and only have to have the amount from 10 to 30 days. Your bank always has the cash for you—simply give your note and check out the money. When you have made your profits take the other fellow's check and pay your note. You have not handled a penny of cash, run no risk of losing same, yet have done business at a profit by the best up-to-date method, while your banker has kept your books and done all the figuring free of charge.

THE CASE OF THE MERCHANT

Why They Need Better Roads—They Spell Prosperity.

To say that the merchants and all other classes of citizens in the towns and cities would be large beneficiaries of the national good roads system is merely to repeat a truism. It could not possibly be otherwise.

The population of the cities creates an ever increasing demand for everything that the farmer can produce as soon as the farmer can supply it. The increased production of every American farm flowing into the towns and cities and through the local channels of commerce, the commission houses and stores into the homes of the people, can only mean increasing prosperity for the merchant, the doctor, the lawyer, the manufacturer, the laborer and all other inhabitants of the city, whatever their calling.

The large increase in the circulation of money, which must necessarily result from the national roads system, spells prosperity for every class of people.—Will T. Whitlow in Better Roads.

PRICES WILL AVERAGE HIGHER

For Live Stock and Farm Products Than at the Same Time Last Year.

According to the Michigan State Crop Report for December.

In answer to the question, "How wheat during December suffered injury from cause?" 130 correspondents in the state answer "yes" and 293 "no," and in answer to the question "Has the ground been well covered with snow during December?" 33 correspondents answer "yes" and 401 "no."

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in December at 91 flouring mills was 95,290 and at 66 elevators and to grain dealers 58,458 or a total of 153,757 bushels. Of this amount 91,320 bushels were marketed in the northern four tiers of counties, 48,565 in the central counties and 13,872 in the northern counties and Upper Peninsula.

The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the five months, August-December, was 2,750,000.

Ninety-one mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in December.

The average condition of live stock in the State is reported as follows, comparison being with stock in good, healthy and thrifty condition: Horses, cattle, sheep and swine 90. The average prices January 1st of some of the principal farm products were as follows:

The average price of wheat per bushel was 93 cents; rye 62 cents; shelled corn 56 cents and oats 35 cents. The average price of hay per ton was $12.50. The average price of fat cattle was $3.42 per cwt.; of fat hogs, $6.65 per cwt.; and of dressed pork $8.90 per cwt.

The average price of each class of horses was as follows: Under one year old $34.52; between one and two years old $36.35; between two and three years old $120.25 and three years old and over $168.00.

Milk cows were worth $16.85 per head. Cattle other than milk cows under one year old $11.02; between one and two years old $23.63; between two and three years old $33.30 and three years old and over $44.76. Sheep under one year $37.50 and one year old and over $1.30. Hogs not fattened $0.20.

The prices given are for the state. The price of wheat is 6 cents higher than one year ago; rye 21 cents; shelled corn 10 cents; oats 12 cents and hay $4.72 lower.

The average prices on horses, etc., one year ago was as follows: Under one year old $31.72; between one and two years old $35.85; between two and three years old $132.45 and three years old and over $162.49.

Milk cows were worth $11.73 per head. Cattle other than milk cows under one year old $12.11; between one and two years old $20.50; between two and three years old $31.08 and three years old and over $39.53.

Sheep under one year old $32.40 and one year and over, $1.75. Hogs not fattened, $5.08 per cwt.

ROAD RULES.

The roadmakers of our country could copy to advantage the methods used in England, which country is noted for its excellent highways. The English road man has a list of instructions which he follows in the care of the roadways. The principal rules, which will be found useful to the roadmakers of this country, are as follows:

Never allow a hollow, a rut or a puddle to remain on a road, but fill it up at once with chips from the stone heap.

Always use chips for patching and for all repairs during the summer months.

Never put fresh stones on the road if by crosspicking and a thorough use of the rake the surface can be made smooth and kept at the proper strength and section.

Remember that the rake is the most useful tool in your collection and that it should be kept close at hand the whole year round.

Do not spread a large patch of road, but coat the middle or horse track first, and when this has worn in coat each of the sides in turn.

In moderately dry weather and on hard road always pick up the old surface into ridges six inches apart and remove all projecting stones before applying a new coating.

Never shoot stones on the road and crack them where they lie or a smooth surface will be out of the question.

and I will go. I will help you climb, but to that star—and I can't."

She had shaken him, as she could always shake him, set him to questioning the real value of the purpose that through forces over which he had no control, as it seemed, had grown until it filled his life, excluding all else. Her hand still rested on his arm, yet he found strength to answer:

"You've said it yourself—caring isn't everything."

He got to his feet slowly. She, too, rose. With a sudden jealous contraction of her heart she realized how little of the grief she had thought to see was in his look. Strength was there, the strength to suffer and to withstand, and something else, almost a glow, the reflection of a spirit banded down to this man across the generations from an age of martyrs who were glad to pay for their faith. With a great price he was paying for his faith, and it became the more precious to him.

She found the need to justify herself before him.

"At least," she said unthinkingly, "you will remember that I didn't pretend until it was too late for you to escape me and then worry you into going my way, as many women have done. I'm not quite so selfish as that. Am I wholly contemptible?"

He judged her generously.

"You aren't contemptible. It is only that you don't love. Love doesn't haggle or try to drag down. You have mistaken, honestly mistaken, something else for it. If you cared—but you don't. You will find that out soon."

For a little she looked at him unwaveringly. Then her strength seemed to wilt.

"You are right, I suppose, and I have missed a great deal. Goodby," and went in the house.

CHAPTER XII.

Locusts and Wild Honey.

A SON of the old regime returning to New Chelsea after four years would have found vast improvements wrought. Nor was the prosperity thus attested merely the crumbs from the table of thriving Plumville. It was all New Chelsea's own, and it had come by the avenue of Stephen Hampden's speculation, for the count company, despite the rules of the game, was a success for all concerned. Already it was paying dividends.

But a great deal more than a "boom" can happen in four years. That number of cycles saw William Murchell's power shaken, totter and crash to the earth. Most people credited this to the craft of Mark Sherrod, state treasurer and the new minister, and his able lieutenant, Governor Parrott. Murchell would have placed the credit or blame elsewhere. He had had the habit of discussing his mistakes, he would have added a year to our calculation and said that the initial blow had been struck at his power when on a certain June day, in company with Jim Sheehan, he had sought to press a bright faced young man into his service.

If it was your good fortune to be a resident of New Chelsea at that time you will remember how John Dunmeade appeared when he was thirty-five—a grave, quiet man, looking older than his years, as carefully dressed as men are apt to be who are dreaming of big things. His hair was beginning to thin at the temples. He walked with a slight stoop and with less spring—the long, slow stride of a man who thinks much on his feet.

He made it a point, however unhappily his cause was progressing, never to seem downcast. You would leave him, probably thinking it a pity that such an attractive man should be so unpractical and the object of so many bitter and powerful enemies. If the truth must be told, New Chelsea was more than a little disappointed in John Dunmeade.

His health was not always good. He had suffered a serious illness during one winter and, between the duties of office, the cares of a growing private practice and the incessant labors of politics, his body had been sadly overtaxed. He was still district attorney, last trophy of the reform wave that had swept over the shattered machine. Under the leadership of Greene, an ex-gambler and former lieutenant of Sheehan, less obviously the brute and far shrewder than the depressed boss, the Plumville organization had risen from its ashes. He had resigned all the county offices, except John, a candidate for re-election, and by a smart margin.

Politics is a hard taskmaster. John found poor compensation in the fact that he had become well known throughout the state. The year after the Reform county reform he had joined himself to the cause of Judge Gray, an honest and capable lawyer who dared to ask the old party nomination for governor against the organization's choice. With the Judge John made a vigorous stump campaign in every county of the state. He was new, he was enthusiastic, he was daring. People listened. Parrott was nominated easily according to the "state."

Judge Dunmeade was not nominated to the supreme court that year; hence the breach of a lifelong friendship, increased bitterness against his son and many I-told-you-sos from Miss Roberta. But John preached on. He did more than attack. He devised and proffered remedies with a naive disregard of the conservative habit of the American mind that inclined him to some apprehension in others and bewilderment in still others. It is not necessary here to enumerate his remedies. They have since become respectable.

He learned in common with other young iconoclasts something of the existence and character and aims of the personal government which lay behind the formal and of the marvelously woven system by which the dominant personalities twisted the form of government to their purpose. Being a young man who thought himself inspired, he was robust and the more determined to destroy that system. Not wholly lacking a sense of proportion, he realized the tenacity of him who undertook such wholesale destruction.

But his youthful optimism and faith in the people had not failed. His task was to expound the machine to the people of his state. Always he saw victory just one year ahead.

In those days—to be exact, three years after the destruction of the Sheehan machine—there was strife in the organizations of both parties. Upon the devoted heads of Murchell and Duffy, the respective bosses, hurled abuse from strange quarters. Aulous cries rang from the deck of the ship Murchell had altered so long. Then the storm burst.

The biennial election of a state treasurer was at hand. There appeared to John one day a plausible gentleman who discussed the troubled waters. He was in a state of righteous indignation. Murchell's domination had continued too long. Patience with his tyrannical ways had ceased to be a virtue. His mindless had been proved by his breach of contract to let Sherrod succeed. And he, the messenger, was glad to say, in confidence, that those able and distinguished patriots and leaders, Mark Sherrod and Philander Parrott, were organizing a revolt and proposed to make the treasurer nomination a test of strength.

And they had commissioned him to urge that other able, etc., John Dunmeade, the man who had "kicked Murchell in his own back yard," to join the reform. He was deeply hurt when John refused.

Halp, who also had made New Chelsea his legal residence, invented sundry lurid epithets to describe John's folly and urged reconsideration. John shook his head.

"But I thought you wanted to put Murchell out of business?"

"Not Murchell. I've grown past that. I'm rather sorry for him just now. And I'd rather have him run things than Sherrod. It's the institution we've got to destroy—as he told me himself once. Nothing's gained if we substitute one boss for another."

"Then what are you going to do, my destructive friend?"

"Try to slip in between them. I think—put up an independent candidate."

John made his campaign. When the primaries had been held, he was himself astonished to discover that nearly a quarter of the delegates chosen were pledged to his independent candidate. But before daylight on the night before the convention John learned that he had been used to draw delegates from Murchell for Sherrod's purpose; he saw his hand dwindle to a faithful handful.

When the convention met, Sherrod was in control. After the preliminaries John, answering to the roll call of counties, played his candidate in nomination in a speech that could hardly be heard for jeers and catcalls. It was brought to an abrupt conclusion by a yell from the gallery, "Sit down, sonny. Only money talks in this convention!" Even the delegates joined in the roar of laughter. And then the coup was accomplished. The Parrott-Sherrod candidate was withdrawn and Sherrod himself substituted. Amid confusion that amounted almost to a riot he was nominated.

A non-partisan candidate was put up that fall. John and Jerry Brent were most active in his support. They made what was said to be a remarkable pity campaign, and in every county they were met with tremendous enthusiasm. People flocked by thousands to hear them and cheered themselves hoarse as the young orators exalted the bosses. But on election day the people unbent to the polls, voted as they had always done and elected the old party ticket by a majority of more than 100,000.

The campaign fixed John's place firmly in the public mind. This place, one that a practical man would have thought twice before seeking, was won at the cost of much of his buoyant optimism. It almost cost him his life also. A heavy cold contracted during the last days of the campaign eventually settled into a stubborn case of pneumonia. There were many anxious days in the Dunmeade home. Nor was Miss Roberta's anxiety unshared. Through three consecutive nights Hugh Dunmeade never sought his couch, but kept a constant vigil by his son's bedside, listening to the painful breathing and without protest, to the reproaches of an inner voice. When the Christmas holidays arrived John was still confined to his room.

That winter Senator Murchell varied his program by spending the congressional recess at his legal residence.

And one Sunday morning he came face to face with the judge and Miss Roberta in the vestibule of the Presbyterian church. It was the first meeting in more than two years.

"The doctor tells me John ought to go south and won't. If it's on account of—er—money matters," the senator looked carefully out into the street. "I'll be glad to help out."

"No, sir," the judge put in stiltedly. "If John needs money it is my right to provide it." It had not occurred to him before to exercise the right.

"Stuff!" said the senator. "I know how you're fixed—high. You can't afford it. I can."

"We Dunmeades, Senator Murchell, don't accept charity from our political enemies."

"Our political enemies! Have you turned reformer, judge?" Murchell inquired innocently. "I thought you didn't believe in agitation."

"At least my son is an honorable gentleman," the judge retorted. "He doesn't go about deceiving his friends with promises he has no intention of keeping." Here the judge certainly scored.

"John," declared the judge later to Roberta with ill concealed pride, "doesn't need charity from me or any one else. Only justice. He's an honest but misguided man."

Others than Senator Murchell overstepped a custom to spend the Yuletide in New Chelsea. To John, by way of Halp and Miss Roberta, came rumors of a very gay house party on the ridge that had been led by some stranger whom to experience the novelty of a country Christmas. One day Miss Roberta brought to him an awful lot of roses sent by Katherine.

"Aunt Robert," he said, "you're the worst fraud in Christieendom."

"I want to tell you," she explained, "Katherine has been thinking about you and somebody suggested sending flowers. So that little Miss Halpness went over the house and got together all they had. Katherine helped her," she added. "She suggested it."

"That was very good of her. Why?"

"John, she isn't engaged yet. Why?"

"Is that a conundrum? Probably, I should say, because she hasn't found any one with the required combination of talents and possessions. Or it may be she has found him and he—let us not be too ungrateful—doesn't know it."

"John, it isn't too late for you."

"It isn't too—why, my gracious! Aunt Roberta, she likes nice, successful, prosperous gentlemen. Honestly now, you could never fit that description to me, could you?" He laughed very heartily.

She looked at him keenly, rose to her feet and went downstairs to procure a vase for the flowers. When she returned, he was staring oddly at them.

"What she read in his expression was not at all unkind."

"Suppose," he said abruptly, "you take the flowers downstairs. They—the odor is a little too heavy."

"I thought," she said quietly, "your laugh was overdone. John, how much had your politics to do with it?"

"A little. She thinks I am a fool. I've found," he added, "that that opinion isn't peculiar to her."

"John," she pleaded wistfully, "why won't you quit? You've done enough."

"Down in your heart, do you want me to quit, Aunt Roberta?"

"Politics has been the ruin of our family. We Dunmeades are all fools!"

"We Dunmeades? You know you never did a foolish thing in your life, Aunt Roberta," he smiled.

"Yes, I did," she answered grimly. "I like your kind of foolishness."

"Aunt Roberta," he said, with a flash of the boyishness he had almost lost, "you're the worst humbug in Christieendom. You think you're crabbed and cranky and practical, when really you're just a generous, great hearted, romantic old dear. You think you've missed something big and wonderful and you're afraid I'm missing it, too. Maybe you have. Maybe I am. But there are more ways than one of finding romance and happiness. I am not an unhappy man."

"Are you telling the truth?" she asked quietly.

The flash of boyishness subsided. "I think I am," he answered gravely.

But afterward, when she had gone he carefully gathered up the fallen petals and tossed them into the fire. He watched them quickly shrivel and disappear.

Grange Column

Bay Shore Grange.

Bay Shore grange met Friday evening with an attendance of eight officers, twenty-eight members and four visitors.

One candidate was elected to membership.

One application for membership and one demit card were received and referred to committees.

Brother George Long was elected insurance director for the ensuing year.

Lecturer's hour was taken up with the following program:

Recitation, J. C. Wallace.
Recitation, Clara Wallace.
Song, O. C. Atwood.
Recitation, Minnie Jones.
Music, Mable Worth.
Recitation, A. Tillotson.
Song, Archie Chew.
Recitation, Ray Karcher.

All members are requested to be present at the next meeting, January 24. Installation of officers and a good time is expected.

Wilson Grange.

Wilson grange met in regular session Saturday, January 11, 1913, with about thirty-five members present. Worthy Master George Jaquays called the meeting to order and during the business session several bills were presented.

The finance committee, after looking over the books, reported a balance on hand of $21.12.

The ladies' auxiliary reported a balance on hand of $55.54, of which $15.00 is to be turned over to the grange treasury.

Brother R. A. Brintnall, assisted by Brother Martin Ruhlberg of Peninsula grange, installed the officers for the ensuing year. Then Brother Ruhlberg gave an interesting report of the proceedings of the State grange, after which impromptu numbers were given for the program by different members. Grange closed in form, after which all partook of refreshments served by the ladies. The next meeting will be held January 25.

Quality Arbor A. O. G.

Quality Arbor met with Companions Walter and Lizzie Black, Saturday evening, January 11, 1913, with an attendance of seventeen members and all officers present.

After the usual order of business, the following officers were installed: Chief, Gleaner, Walter Black; secretary and treasurer, Lizzie Black; chaplain, Maud Cook; conductor, Clarence Neggison; conductress, Pearl Piskow; lecturer, Josephine Ingalls; inner guard, Ed Reed; outer guard, Charles Cook.

The lecture hour consisted of stories, songs and readings and a report of the proceedings of the board of supervisors by Companion Elmer Ingalls.

After closing in due form to meet with Companions D. E. and Ross Ingalls in February, all were invited to the dining room where a table spread with a feast to tempt the Gods met the eye of the beholder and caused a broad smile of an anticipation which in no wise became lessened as steaming hot oysters appeared as a first course.

After supper a short time was spent in pleasant conversation, music and singings. After which the company dispersed. All united in pronouncing Mr. and Mrs. Black delightful entertainers and feeling that the evening would long be remembered as one of the bright spots in the lives of all participants.

Charlevoix Grange.

Charlevoix grange met in regular session Monday night, Worthy Lecturer Usher presiding, with an attendance of forty members and visitors.

The officers for the ensuing year were installed by Brother William Withers of Marion Center grange, after which the lecturer furnished a program of songs, recitations and stories.

The following standing committees were announced: Executive, E. B. Ward, A. J. Usher, R. W. Padock; finance, O. D. Hammond, R. S. Shapton, Reuben Geer; charity, Henry Black, Sr., Anna Ward, Lephin Hammond; woman's work, Martha Dutton, Jennie Black, Mary Crandall.

After grange closed a visit was paid to "The Sugar Bowl" where refreshments were enjoyed. Next meeting January 27.

Now is the time to select your piano if you want one and if you don't come and see us anyway at the old Cohen store. Grinnell Bros.—Adv.

Peninsula Grange.

Peninsula grange met in regular session Thursday, January 9, at two o'clock P. M. A quorum was present and a lot of regular business was disposed of.

Owing to the farmers' institute coming on the regular date of grange meeting, grange will be held January 24, at which time will occur the installation of officers for the ensuing year.

Thursday, January 16, at ten o'clock a. m., there will be a house party at R. Meads. Grangers and their families are welcome. Good place for teams in the grange sheds near by. Friday evening, January 17, there will be a dance and oyster supper at the hall. Do not forget these dates. Come and have a jolly good time.

There is no investment you can make that will compare in dividends with the returns in happiness and pleasure that a good piano will be sure to bring to you and to your home.—Adv.

BOY SCOUTS TO AID CIVIC WORK

Will Enter All Fields of Community Welfare.

STUDY FIRE PREVENTION.

A List of Things to Do Has Been Circulated All Over the Country, and Scouts in Every State Are Planning Winter Campaigns.

In pursuance of a plan to make the training and activities of the Boy Scouts of America not only helpful to themselves and to those with whom they come in contact, but also to the entire community, state and nation, new phases of scout work are being developed in all fields of community welfare.

Great success is anticipated in the work with boys in forest protection and reforestation, city fire fighting and prevention, animal and bird conservation, war against the fly and the mosquito, civic health, etc.

The following advice for the boys in fire prevention has been submitted by Fire Commissioner Charles H. Cole of

BOY SCOUTS CLEARING UP IN NEW YORK
Boston, embodying recommendations by Chief Mullen and Deputy Chief Grady of the Boston fire department:

I.—RINGING OF ALARMS
1. Know the number and location of the fire alarm box nearest your house.
2. Be sure that your father, mother and the rest of your family know the location of the nearest fire alarm box.
3. Go to the nearest fire station and learn how to give an alarm.
4. In case of fire keep cool. Run to a box at once and pull the alarm. Opening the door rings the bell, but does not give the alarm. After the door is opened pull down the hook that you will find inside the box. This gives the alarm.
5. Stand at the box until the engines arrive, so that you may tell the firemen where the fire is.
6. In case of a fire in your house, if you have a telephone, call "Fire department—emergency." Wait until the fire alarm operator comes on the wire. He will ask you the street and number of your house and your telephone number. Don't leave the telephone until you have answered all his questions.

II.—FIRE PREVENTION.
1. Be careful how you use matches. Use only safety matches. Always keep them in metal holders. Don't light them in closets where light dresses or materials are hung. Don't light them near curtains.
2. In lighting a fire in a stove do not use kerosene in order to make it start quickly.
3. Keep all light material, such as cotton, muslin or lace, away from stoves and lighted gas jets.
4. Never look for a gas leak with a lighted match, candle or kerosene lamp. Notify the gas company. They will know how to locate the leak.
5. If a fire has started in a room it is better not to open the doors or windows. Let the fire department do that when it arrives.
6. If you know of any place in your neighborhood where quantities of rubbish, shavings or paper have been allowed to accumulate notify a policeman or fireman.
7. Notify a policeman or fireman if you know of any obstruction or snow or ice on a fire escape.
8. Never use gasoline for cleaning purposes in a room. The fumes that gasoline gives off when confined in a room will take fire from a lighted match, lamp or gas jet.
9. If your clothing catches fire don't run. Roll yourself in a blanket, rug or anything, so as to smother the fire.
10. Do the same thing to another person if his clothing is on fire.
11. In case of fire in an automobile throw sand on it.
12. Learn how to handle a fire extinguisher. Fire extinguisher heads should be removed and contents altered once a year.
13. Learn the use of standpipes and hose.
14. Learn where the exits and fire escapes are in your school.
15. Don't forget what you have been taught in school about your fire drill.
16. Give a copy of these rules to all the families in your neighborhood.
17. Don't put hot ashes in a wooden box or barrel. An iron barrel is the proper thing.
18. Don't have gas jets with swinging arms placed near windows.
19. Don't thaw water pipes with anything flame. Use hot water only.

III.—FIRE PREVENTION.
1. Be careful how you use matches. Use only safety matches. Always keep them in metal holders. Don't light them in closets where light dresses or materials are hung. Don't light them near curtains.

Do You Know Anything About CHIROPRACTIC

Chiropractic (Ki-ro-prak-tik) is the science of adjusting the subluxations (displacements) in the spinal column, commonly called the backbone, for the purpose of removing pressure from the nerves. The spinal column is the only place nerves pass between hard bony surfaces, that are MOVABLE, therefore, practically the only place nerves can be impinged or the nerve restricted, and it matters not what part of the body or organ is affected, the CAUSE is in the spinal column. I ask no questions, simply analyze the spine and I tell you every place you are affected. Chiropractic is the only science that REMOVES THE CAUSE of disease and is done without pain, drugs or knife, I use nothing but my hands. The whole object is accomplished when the nerve is released.

I do not TREAT, I remove the CAUSE, nature cures.

Analysis and Consultation free. Let me tell you where you are affected by analyzing your spine. Because it is new do not say "it is impossible."

I guarantee to cure any case I take charge of or it will cost you nothing. All I ask is a chance, and I will cure you of your trouble.

Kellogg-Haines Singing Party Tuesday

Evening, January 28

One of the Best Attractions on Platform—What the Press Says of It.

The Kellogg-Haines Singing Party is one of the standard attractions in the lyceum world today. In fact, for five years past this organization has been regarded as such, and by its long seasons work year after year on the lyceum and chautauqua platform, has already attained what may be termed perfection in a mixed quartet.

This organization presents a program of selections from the best known grand operas, light operas and from other musical literature.

There are five members in the Kellogg-Haines Singing Party, including a pianist.

Miss Lotta Fahlen, soprano, aside from her extensive church choir experience has sung principal rolls with the Shubert Opera company and studied with the best teachers in America.

Miss Albin Montague, the contralto, studied for two years under the well known Professor McBurney of Chicago and was for a time soloist of the big Hyde Park Baptist church in that city. She is a graduate of the Chicago University with an A. B. degree.

John Eichenberger, tenor, was the tenor soloist in several of the best paid church choirs in St. Louis, has had theatrical experience and has coached with the best teachers in this country.

William A. Goldberg, baritone, was a boy wonder on the violin, later discovering that he had a fine voice. He gave up the violin for years professionally. He has also sung leading grand opera roles in English before entering the lyceum.

William James Beach, accompanist and monologist, makes one of the hits of the program. He has been with the company from its inception and has also studied with the best teachers.

While the members of this company are all good soloists their claim to recognition is chiefly in their quartet work. The claim has been made that while male quartets by long practice often reach a very high standard of ensemble perfection, that it is doubtful if any other mixed quartet in America can approach the Kellogg-Haines Singing party in that sinking of individuality and perfect blending of voices which comprises ideal quartet work. In addition to the mixed quartets, three members of the company comprise a male trio of equal merit.

The St. Louis Star-Chronicle. The Kellogg-Haines Singing Party who appeared in the Symphony Orchestra at Trolan Alps is one of the best mixed quartets appearing before the public. They rendered some very beautiful numbers among others the "Se Sarin Rose Waltz" and the "Lucia Sextette." The latter was the gem of their concert.

Detroit Free Press. The Kellogg-Haines Singing Party appeared at the Masonic Temple last evening.

They gave a very pleasing entertainment, singing selections ranging from light comedy to grand opera. The individual members have splendid voices, well trained and quite adequate to anything they attempt. The scene from "Martha" was well presented and well sung, and the light touches of comedy were never overdone.

Reserve seat sale for the Kellogg-Haines Concert Monday, January 27, at Central Drug Store. Numbers drawn any time during the day. Seats given out at 7:30 p. m.

The concert will begin promptly at 8:15, Tuesday, January 28. Remember that it will take some time for all to get seated, and that no one will be seated during the progress of any number of the program.

HANSEN-MORSE

Former Charlevoix Business Woman Married in Cleveland December 30.

Word has been received in this city of the marriage of Mrs. Elsie McGeagh Morse, formerly of this city, and P. Robert Hansen of Leeds, England, December 30, at Cleveland, Ohio, in the presence of a number of guests, Bishop Donnelly officiating.

The bride is well known in this city, having formerly been a member of the firm of McGeagh & Morse, while the groom comes of an old English family. Mr. and Mrs. Hansen will leave early in the year for the home of the groom, where they will take up life in the "Old Home by the Sea," which has been in the family since the year 1628.

J. L. CRANE, President of The Charlevoix State Savings Bank

At the first regular meeting of the board of directors held subsequent to the annual meeting of stockholders, Mr. J. L. Crane was elected president of the bank for the new year to succeed R. P. Foley, who retires on account of having acquired large business interests in the South and where he will claim his residence in the future. Mr. Foley remains his stock in the bank and the bank will continue to have Mr. Foley as one of their valuable customers, as heretofore.

W. J. Rachow, the efficient cashier, was made a vice-president and H. S. Harshing, 2nd vice president as heretofore. All the officers were elected by the unanimous vote of the board and the stockholders are to be congratulated on having such men at the head of this financial institution.

J. L. Crane, the new president, elect, is one of our most estimable, substantial and successful business men, having resided in our city for the past ten years and conducted a dry goods and ladies' furnishings store. He is successful in his undertakings, conservative, courteous and obliging in his dealings and well regarded by all who know him. We know this bank has a strong list of local stockholders and, with its capable management, it will continue to furnish funds for the borrower and security and interest for the depositors. There will be no change in the policy of the bank and its customers will be met in the same liberal manner as heretofore.

tinuous body, the terms of only one commissioner expiring every two years. Another source of misfortune to the county is the enormous expense of holding a primary election for this purpose only, it being estimated that the cost to the county of nominating candidates for county road commissioners this spring will in round numbers be nearly one thousand dollars.

The same laws now governing primary elections in this state will apply to the city primary.

WILL BE NOMINATED DIRECT

Political Parties of This City Will Choose Candidates by Primary System.

ENROLLMENT DAY SATURDAY

County Road Commissioners Must be Nominated by Direct Vote.

Expense to the County Will be Nearly Thousand Dollars. General Primary Law Will Govern City Primaries.

In accordance with the vote of the people the nominations for city officers will be made this year by the primary system. The time of holding such primary is fixed for the first Wednesday in March preceding the April election.

Enrollment day will be next Saturday, January 25, when all voters who are not already enrolled or desire to change their party affiliation, will be given an opportunity to enroll. Unless you enroll on that date you will not be entitled to vote at the primary.

Candidates to be named by all political parties will be mayor, city clerk, city treasurer, one alderman, one supervisor and one constable from each ward.

In addition to the city officers, under a recent ruling of the attorney general, candidates of all political parties will also be named for county road commissioners, the present commissioners, R. C. Hammett, Frank Bricker and H. L. Olney holding their present positions by appointment of the board of supervisors.

The necessity of holding the primary for the nomination of county road commissioners is unfortunate for the county, in more ways than one, as the present board naturally hesitates on going ahead with the work, not knowing whether any of them will be on the new commission. After the April election, however, the commission will be a continuous body, the terms of only one commissioner expiring every two years.

Another source of misfortune to the county is the enormous expense of holding a primary election for this purpose only, it being estimated that the cost to the county of nominating candidates for county road commissioners this spring will in round numbers be nearly one thousand dollars.

The same laws now governing primary elections in this state will apply to the city primary.

INTER CITY HOSPITALITY

Elk Rapids Ladies Entertained, a Number of Charlevoix Dames Last Week.

Mrs. F. R. Williams and Mrs. A. K. Dougherty of Elk Rapids, were hostesses last week at a house party at which the guests were Mesdames R. W. Paddock, F. G. Hines, A. F. Dodge, W. E. Hampton, P. F. Meech, F. M. Sears and Miss Marion Harries of Charlevoix, and Mrs. Ira A. Adams of Bellaire. The ladies arrived Wednesday morning, and in the afternoon a five-course luncheon and reception were given in their honor at the Dougherty home. During the reception Mrs. Adams sang very beautifully. Thursday afternoon they were guests at a luncheon and card party at the home of Mrs. Williams, which was really a banquet, a feature of which was hand painted score cards by Mrs. Williams, who is an artist of state wide reputation.

A return of the inter city visit is already being planned and our business men could well take a lesson from the ladies and start a movement for a more intimate business acquaintanceship as the ladies are already doing socially.

BELIEVED TO BE DROWNED

Clarence Russell of Boyne City Thought to Have Found Watery Grave.

Mystery surrounds the absence of Clarence Russell, aged 39, who left his boarding place in Boyne City, Thursday, with the intention of skating to this city. Several reported having seen a boy of Russell's description skating on Pine Lake. About two hundred men spent Sunday searching the lake in hopes of finding some clue as to his whereabouts without result, and it is believed he was drowned.

List of Newly Elected Officers of the Different Fraternal Organizations in Charlevoix—File for Reference.

Charlevoix fraternal societies are all in a prosperous condition, all reporting increases in membership during the past year. The most important event in the history of Charlevoix fraternalism has been the completion of the new Masonic Temple, the members of the craft now having the finest temple to be found in the state in a city of this size.

In this issue we endeavor to publish the names of the newly elected officers of the different fraternal organizations. If there are any omitted, secretaries are requested to hand them in.

HIS RISE TO POWER

By Henry Russell Miller,
Author of
"The Man Higher Up"

Copyright, 1911, by the Bobbs-Merrill Company

CHAPTER XIII. The Forerunner.

HIS RISE TO POWER. The doctor had prescribed three months' rest. John was back in New Orleans in one, preparing to begin a new campaign against the state machine.

The campaign that followed was a weary repetition of other years, with out the stimulus of hope. The spirit of enthusiasm past, the people were sunk back into habitual lack of interest. The only notable political feature of that year was the quiet organization within the organization between the old boss and the new, a struggle in which Murchell was forced to yield.

When a man sees the best years of his life slipping away with no accomplishment, when he has suffered not only demoralization and misrepresentation, which are not easy to bear, but also treachery and ridicule, which are harder, and misunderstanding and indifference from the people he is trying to serve, which are hardest of all, he cannot be greatly blamed for wanting sometimes to "chuck the game," as Halg put it to John one evening in early winter. The bantering friendship between them, grown deeper as the years passed, had been worth more to John than he quite realized.

"Why don't you chuck the game, you're further back than you were years ago. The people's won off, the doctor's tired of hearing you, and they believe that somehow you're worse than an anarchist. And you're even going to be kicked out of office next spring. Do you know that? You're breaking down your health. You're doing the work of three men and a small boy for nothing. This county is growing. There's going to be plenty of law business. And you could be the biggest lawyer around here. You are that now in point of ability, though the Lord knows where you find time to study your cases. Why don't you chuck it? Serving the people is the most worthless, thankless job in the world."

"You besotted cynic!" John laughed. "What if we don't get any further forward? We can't let 'em have the state by default, can we? And it isn't altogether thankless. Once in a while I run into men like Cranshaw or this well or Sykes. When I see how they depend on me, I-I have to stick it out. It isn't necessarily worthless, either. I've generally found that if you hold on to the breaking point and then let go a little longer, things get easier and of a sudden."

"Sunday school aphorisms. What's to be the next slaughter of the innocents?"

"We elect a governor next year."

"And where'll you find a candidate?"

"Well," said John cheerfully, "I could run myself, you know."

"And after you more, Jerald pills, eh? Halg was trying to decide whether he was a Socialist or not, hence was critical of all remedies and theories."

"I suppose you are thinking of your brotherhood as a substitute?"

"Not my brotherhood!" Halg snorted. "I wouldn't have the dolls they call the people as my brothers. They're interesting to me only as a study in gashliness. What can you expect of a people whose very ideal is concentrated selfishness?"

"But the people don't understand that's all."

"Not understand! You can say that! Do you suppose there's an intelligent man in the state who doesn't know that you have as much brains and capacity for government, and far more character, than either Murchell or Sherrod or any of their tribe? Yet they turn you down for their every time. Why? Because the Murchells and the Sherrods represent the people. You don't. Ninety-nine out of a hundred men, all over the nation, have a pretty clear notion of what's going on in politics and government, and they have a rudimentary social instinct that tells them it is wrong. Sometimes that instinct gets them interested in a reform, but the interest lasts only for about one campaign. Just as you have found it. We don't really care. We don't want things changed."

"But—"

"Here, I have the floor. Things are rotten—yes! There's a stink in every place of our national life. You think you have a purpose in life to clean up this state. Well, then play the game as you find it, make of yourself a despot. And when you have your power, use it to win compromises from the other strong ones, and to give the people just as much as they are able to use and enjoy. Among a selfish people only a supreme, practical egotism can lead."

Halg sat back, relighting his pipe. "Gosh!" he exclaimed. "Reminds me of my college debating society. But I mean it," he added earnestly.

John smiled faintly. He leaned forward and caught up the poker, absently jabbing the coals in the stove. He was thinking of another time when out of her ignorance, a young woman had stumbled, far less cleverly, upon the same theory. He said:

"One must build from the bottom upward. The nation can be saved from its sins neither by struggling individuals nor by mechanical systems. Only to the aroused moral sense of the people a realization and acceptance of political responsibility, and a man can't very successfully preach political morality unless he practices it. He has to serve in the way for which he's best fitted. I don't think I'm cut out for a boss. Halg."

Halg growled again. "Service—who wants your service? What you need is some woman to come along and marry you out of hand and teach you common sense. Why didn't you marry Katherine Hamilton when you had the chance?"

"I never really had the chance," John replied calmly.

"Oh, go to the devil!" And with characteristic abruptness Halg rose and walked out of the office.

A minute later he reappeared to demand, "Do you still want to go?"

"Want to what?" said John so blankly that Halg again recommended the devil as his ultimate destination and withdrew.

Out in the street he stopped long enough to look back through the window. John was still absently jabbing the coals. Halg shook his head and passed on, muttering to the snowy night:

"I have seen a miracle—a man who has lived, yet believes in the people and who has lived the same woman through five years. I wonder how long his courage will hold out?"

John drew up to the desk and began a letter. It did not progress rapidly. His pen had gone as far as "Replying to your favor of the 20th inst.," when it fell unheeded from his fingers. He returned to his contemplation of the fire.

He was thinking of Katherine Hamilton. He had been thinking of her a great deal lately, after a long period in which he had kept the remembrance of her in the secret, rarely opened chamber of his innermost consciousness.

It had been the easier to bury, if not completely to forget, the past, because Katherine's life and his had not often crossed. The incident of the flowers, which had been told, one day, a week before the conversation just narrated, had been accidentally met.

He was in the Steel City to deliver his lecture on "Civic responsibility," before one of the reform bodies that discussed, but did nothing to alleviate the city's ills. For early luncheon he went into a restaurant where elaborate trappings and service enabled the patron to ignore the moderately well cooked food and immoderately high prices.

As he was passing through the foyer he came face to face with Katherine Hamilton and another lady, whose attire proclaimed her one of the fashionable select. There was a moment's hesitation, and then impulsively Katherine held out her hand. Mutual inquiries concerning each other's health followed, were satisfactorily answered, and Katherine introduced him to her companion Mrs. Deland, who had just returned from a great height, down upon the rather contrived looking man who carried the queue, black starch hat.

"This is the Mr. Munroe," Katherine explained.

"Oh, indeed!" was the murmured answer, accompanied by a gracious smile. Mrs. Deland, it was clear, had never heard of "the Mr. Munroe." And then another group entered the foyer and with scant ceremony she occupied to John them, Katherine said:

"There isn't any reason why we shouldn't have a nice, chummy little chat, is there? I am waiting for Mr. Gregg, who is always late. Shall we sit down somewhere?"

He assented, and they ensconced themselves on a luxurious divan, with which the foyer was equipped.

"He is still faithful, you see," she laughed. Obviously she referred to Gregg. "They are preparing to have me on the shelf. I am almost twenty-nine, you may remember. And they are beginning to put me on boards and committees and things already! It is suspected in some quarters that I runge."

He smiled his skepticism.

"No, I don't. I don't doubt I'll come to it in time. About yourself, you have had some very interesting experiences, haven't you? I keep tab on you through the newspapers. I heard a man say you were a very fine compliment. Ought I to tell you, I wonder? Or do you receive so many that one more wouldn't interest?"

"It is when we get few that a compliment is dangerous. I'm not sure, but I'll risk it," he said shyly.

"He said, 'A man can't keep on preaching democracy as earnestly and bravely as Munroe does unless he's a pretty decent sort of chap himself.' I don't mind telling you it was Mr. Gregg who said that." She did not add that Gregg had qualified his compliment with, "Of course he's a crank."

"That was kind of Gregg."

"He often speaks of you. He admires you and is very much interested in your career. We may call it that, mayn't we?"

"If you can't think of a better word, I'll wish it were not necessary to bring Gregg's name so often into the conversation."

They talked for a few minutes longer on uninteresting, impersonal subjects until they saw Gregg appear at the entrance. But Mrs. Deland, effectively waylaid him, and there was an awkward pause which John did not know how to bridge.

Katherine said, on an impulse, the wisdom of which may be regarded as doubtful: "About what you said of your career. I don't like to hear you speak so—so lightly of it. I think you had been very brave and splendid. Not many men would have held out as you have."

He was taken off his guard. "I did not expect you to think so."

"My notions of values and things have changed a good deal, I find. And, I—may I go on?" She looked at Gregg. He was still in Mrs. Deland's clutches. "I was a very selfish, thoughtless girl—then, I deliberately—no, carelessly, which is worse—jeopardized your happiness in the search for my own. I have been heartily ashamed of it. I hope it did not mean serious unhappiness to you."

He looked at her steadily. "I have not been unhappy." Then he rose to greet Gregg, who had extricated himself.

The latter was very cordial. "Any time you're in town call me up and we'll lunch at the club. Any time, remember?"

But he did not miss Katherine's tone as she said to John, "Goodbye—and I am very glad of what you have just told me."

Later, when they were at their table, Gregg said to Katherine, "I have a notion that the reason you have kept me waiting so long is—"

Under his gaze the tinge of color in her cheeks deepened. She made no reply.

"Does it ever occur to you," he asked, carefully setting down the glass, "that I might get tired of waiting?"

"Does it ever occur to you," she answered, "that I shouldn't care very much?"

But of this John could know nothing.

The ceremony of exchanging minutes was not an elaborate court function. Fifty odd gentlemen, representing each his principality, met in a hotel parlor and elected Mark Sherrod to succeed William Murchell as chairman of the state executive committee.

As the latter retired from the chair, which symbol of his undoubted sway, he had occupied for twenty years, and his economy took his place, there was nothing to indicate that the seals of dominion had been formally transferred.

The monarch was not present in person. Many of the committee men were surprised at Murchell's presence. They had thought that he would stay away to escape the last humiliation of holding the formal ratification of his accomplished defeat.

He had gone to the meeting in a carriage because the weather was rough and his physical condition was not good. But when he left he forgot the carriage and started to walk to the house that he called home. He walked aimlessly, head lowered, as though he were pondering some deep problem. The defiant front that he had maintained before the committee had been a pose. He was feeling old—old!

His course took him past a house of state, where the monarch sat enthroned and his court, directing the affairs of his kingdom. What Mark Sackett saw was the office building of the Atlantic railroad. He entered the elevator and was rapidly hoisted to the proper story. A page of ebony skin took his bag.

Murchell did not have to wait long. Soon he was before his former foe.

The royal brow wrinkled. "Isn't this a little indiscreet, considering the present state of public sentiment?"

"What difference does it make now? I've just come from the committee meeting."

"Yes?" Sackett understood. "Sherrod's elected, I suppose?"

"Yes. Thanks to your influence."

"I'm sorry," Sackett's regret was genuine. "But I have my duty."

"To your stockholders, of whom I am one. Yes, I know. I'm not complaining," Murchell interrupted mildly. "I came to tell you to keep an eye on the Michigan. I've kept them out of the Steel City for you so far. But they're coming in. They ought to get in, too. At any rate, they're getting ready to spend a million in the attempt. I don't believe Sherrod can keep them out. Keep an eye on him, Sackett."

"We're counting on you to help there."

Murchell shook his head. "I'm through."

"Look here! What's the use of your getting your back up over this loss, then? You understand perfectly well that we must stand in with whoever's on top. You put Sherrod out and we'll back you as strong as ever. I wish," Sackett said persuasively, "you'd keep an oversight of the Michigan matter. I doubt myself that Sherrod can keep them out."

"Little bit thinking that, aren't you? He can't. Don't trust him to do it. Sherrod won't last, Sackett. He has no self control. He's too greedy. But I'm through. I don't want to put him out."

"We'll make it worth your while, if that's the trouble."

"You can't make it worth my while."

"You make me a fool!" Sackett exclaimed angrily. "You'll make me tired with your infernal bickerings and jealousies. I'd as soon be back in the old days."

"No, you wouldn't!" Murchell interrupted again dryly. "You wouldn't go back to those days for many times the millions I'll owe you to keep the Michigan out—if you keep it out. You know that I know it. You railroaders have grown big for the last few years just because in every state of the Union there's been a man like me, willing to prostitute himself at your service."

Sackett looked a real astonishment and suspicion.

"You needn't be afraid," Murchell grimly answered the suspicion. "I'll be here for the rest of my life. I'm not going to fight you. I'm going to quit."

He slumped back in his chair, his closing his eyes as though he were very tired. He sat for several minutes without speaking, forgetting that Sackett's time was precious. Sackett, too, seemed to have forgotten this important fact. He was wrinkling his brow over the problem, what means to devise to induce an old, plumed, betrayed minister to remain in the service in a minor capacity. He was too shrewd to argue for many years he had had intimate knowledge of Murchell's inflexibility.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he began at last. "I'll see Sherrod and—"

Senator Murchell looked up sharply, as though he had forgotten the other's presence. "I'm through. I've earned a rest, and my health's gone back on me. I'm going back to the farm to raise potatoes—the farmer vote crop has perished out. And if I ever do come back into politics I'll make my own terms."

He nodded a careless goodbye and went slowly out of the office. Apparently he had forgotten to shake hands. Sackett did not remind him of the omission. He remained with the impression of having beheld a broken, hence harmless, old man.

BEAVER MAY BE KILLED

Not likely Many Will be Killed—Rigid Law Restrictions.

The first open season for the killing of beaver that the state has known for many years began January 1. It is unlikely that many beaver will be killed, so rigid is the law in its restrictions and so careful are the landholders in refusing permits to trappers to hunt beaver on their property. The Calumet & Hecla, which controls 100,000 acres of land in Keweenaw county, for instance, refuses absolutely to permit the killing of beaver within its properties and will have men patroling its lands to see that no trapping is done thereon. A trapper must pay a license of $10 for each 15 beaver to be killed and no one may take more than four beaver from one family or house.

EAST JORDAN'S MAYOR DEAD

Was Prominent Manufacturer in That City—Leaves Wife and Three Children.

R. T. Steffes, mayor of East Jordan, suffered a stroke of paralysis Sunday evening. Reports came that he was getting along nicely and the citizens of the county were surprised on hearing that he had passed away about five o'clock
Tuesday evening.

Mr. Steffes was a prominent cigar manufacturer in his home city. For the past two years he had served as deputy sheriff, resigning January 1 on account of other business.
Mr. Steffes was a member of the Masonic order. He leaves his wife and three children.

L. D. Bartholomew Ill.

This forenoon a telegram was received by F. E. Wood from the L. O.
O. F. of Riveria, Texas, giving the intelligence of the serious illness of L. D. Bartholomew, in that city, where he is spending the winter, and requesting him to come there at once. Mr. Wood is in Texas at once.

Mr. Bartholomew, one of our oldest and most highly respected business men and his many friends hope that the report of his illness may be exaggerated.

AUCTION WAS BIG SUCCESS

Bert Mason's Opening Sale Magnet Which Drew Enormous Crowds.

New Store is One of The Most Complete Establishments in Northern Michigan.

The auction sale opening of Bert Mason in his new location was a big success, the store being thronged with eager bidders each afternoon and evening of the sale.

Equal in drawing power of the sale itself was the opportunity to see the new store, which in completeness of arrangement, size and ability to handle a large volume of business is not surpassed by any similar establishment in northern Michigan, and Mr. Mason is the recipient of many compliments for his enterprise in moving into his new quarters where he can take care of his large trade.

Mr. Mason is undecided whether he will hold another auction or not, but if he does it is safe to say that his mammoth new quarters will be crowded to their utmost capacity to hold the crowds that would attend.

whereby we are enabled to keep them informed of the transactions which take place in his court.

In the matter of the estate of Di-anthy J. Green, deceased, R. W. Kane was appointed administrator, with the will annexed.

Jennie Ware of Boyne City, admitted to Traverse City State Hospital on petition of her husband, Charles Ware.

In the matter of the estate of De-Witt Keenholds, petition filed by Hattie Keenholds praying that letters of administration be granted to J. H. Milford.

In juvenile division, James England of Keweenaw township, aged 9 years, was admitted to state public school at Coldwater.

TWELVE COUNTIES

ATWOOD STORE BURNS DOWN

Skow & Bergsma's Establishment Totally Destroyed
Tuesday Night of Last Week.

The store of Skow & Bergsma at Atwood was totally destroyed by fire Tuesday night of last week. The loss is estimated at about $1,500, partially covered by insurance.

It is not known how the fire started.

It was noticed first about half past one by J. Adema, who was sitting up with a sick relative.

Had the wind been strong there is no doubt but that the whole town would have been wiped off the map.

Not a Candidate.

State Highway Commissioner
Riley has withdrawn from the race for re-nomination, to his present position, and announces he will throw his influence to Deputy Frank F. Rogers. This leaves the contest between Mr. Rogers and Richard L. Fletcher of Bay City.

Expensive Soda Water.

The highest price ever paid for a bottle of soda water was given in London recently when one that was a relic from the wreck of the Royal George was auctioned off and brought $134.
The Royal George went down in 1782 which made the soda water somewhat old. Two-thirds of the liquid remained in the bottle, the inside of which was discolored and thickly incrusted with sea salt. The bottle was of the same shape as those used for aerated waters at the present time, but the glass was of a deeper green and slightly heavier. Soda water was invented in 1767, and the relic was bought by a soda water manufacturer for advertising purposes.—New York Press.

CLEAN FEED LOTS PAY GOOD PROFITS

Discussing the causes that operate to prevent the making of satisfactory gains on cattle, a Missouri correspondent of Iowa Homestead calls attention to the importance of keeping the feed lot clean and comfortable. He says:
Many men have failed to make a profit from feeding live stock for market because they have failed to provide a clean and sanitary feed lot for their fattening animals. Live stock that are compelled to wade knee deep in the mud and sleep in damp, unsheltered places cannot make satisfactory gains in flesh condition.

Every feed lot should be provided with a windbreak on the two sides that are most exposed to the coldest winds and storms. Water tanks should be placed in an elevated position, for many times the fattening animals will go without water rather than wade through a deep mudhole to get to the drinking place.

On the farm where considerable straw is produced it should be used in liberal quantities about the feed

The Shorthorn approaches the ideal as a beef producer. The head is expressive, being rather broad across the forehead. The neck is moderately thick and set well into the shoulders, which when viewed from the front are wide, showing thickness through the heart. The breast coming well forward and the forelegs short and wide apart. The hind quarters are long and well filled in. The hind legs should be short and stout wide and straight.
The bull shown was champion
Shorthorn at the Iowa state fair.

Some of it will be enter and the balance tramped into the mud to make manure and keep the yard dry. In applying straw to the surface of the feed yards a large application at first is better, as it will form a layer between the soil and the balance of the straw and manure and make it much easier work to clean the yards than when a little at a time is heaped to the yard, and it is tramped into the mud and mixed, making much to the back of the manure and making it harder to work up when the yards are cleaned in the spring after the top soil and manure have become thoroughly mixed.

By making the feed lot comfortable for the stock, by using the straw in the feed lots and stables, it is where it should be in the spring—in the manure heap and not in unsightly piles in the field to be worked around or moved out of the way. Few farmers realize the increased profits they could make from their feeding operations if they would make their animals comfortable.
The comfort that can be had by keeping the feed lots clean saves much fuel, besides causing the farmer price-ing it to take more pride in his business.

To this might be added that in many cases muddy feed lots are partially due to the fact that no attempt is made to prevent the water from the roofs of farm buildings from flooding the yards.
Compared with the daily cost of feeding a bunch of cattle the cost of a small amount of eaves troughing is a small matter, and where bedding is scarce eaves troughs alone will often make the difference between foul feed yards and yards that are reasonably clean.

Longevity of Dairy Cows.

Professor L. H. Eckles of the Missouri experiment station sums up his investigations along the line of the probable longevity of dairy cows in part as follows:

Probably the majority of dairy cattle are rejected from the herd on account of failure to breed or from under trouble before the effect of advancing years can be observed to any marked extent.
It is a fact often observed that a cow may make her best record when ten or eleven years old, although, as a rule, she does her best rather earlier. If a dairy cow continues to breed she usually shows no marked decline until at least twelve years old. Occasionally a cow continues to breed until she is sixteen or eighteen years old.

Economy of Silage.

A ton of silage is the cheapest food that we can produce when considered from an economical standpoint. One acre of corn will make from twelve to twenty tons of silage, equal in feeding value to six or eight tons of hay, besides occupying one-third or one-fourth as much space when stored and costing less to harvest. A cow that is fed silage and clover or alfalfa hay will give a large amount of milk with the addition of a small amount of grain.

Fodder left in the stock will lose from 25 to 50 per cent of its feeding value, besides being a bad practice. It is the best to use it in a feed lot during the end of the season, before it is too late to use it. The plan to stock it in a feed lot is to keep it in the stock lot and feed it to the stock.

Officers Installed.

Wednesday night was a red letter event in the history of Charlevoix Oddfellowship, the occasion being the installation of officers of Round Lake lodge. The contest between the "Reds" and the "Blues" brought out a large crowd and the members of the Rebebek lodge were present in force as guests.

District Deputy Grand Master Andrew Ross installed the officers in an impressive manner, after which the members and guests enjoyed a big feast.

Aching Kidneys Cured in Charlevoix

If Your Back Aches and Your Kidneys are Weak, Get the Kidney Remedy That Has Been Proved GOOD Again and Again Right Here in Charlevoix.

Charlevoix People Tell It

Are YOUR Kidneys Weak?

HOW TO TELL First read the testimony and learn what Doan's Kidney Pills have done for others. Then if your back aches, if sharp pains strike you when stooping or lifting, if you are lame in the morning, tire too easily, if you have dizzy spells and are nervous, despondent and inclined to worry over trifles, if the kidney secretions are highly colored and full of sediment, if the passages are too frequent, scanty, painful or scalding, it is likely that your kidneys need quick attention. Take a sample of the urine and let it stand for 24 hours. If a sandy, brick dust like sediment settles to the bottom of the receptacle, there is evidence enough to suspect the kidneys.

Henry Newman, 203 Sheridan St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I have been troubled for years by my kidneys. I was annoyed by too frequent passages of the kidney secretions at night and I also had backache. I read of Doan's Kidney Pills and got a box at the Ivy Drug Store. They gave me great relief. I can now rest better and do not have much backache."	Mrs. R. M. McNeil, 211 Mason St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I can recommend Doan's Kidney Pills highly. I had been troubled for several months by kidney disease. My body floated quite badly and I had weak back and severe pains in my kidneys. My rest was broken at night. I obtained Doan's Kidney Pills at the Ivy Drug Store and they have given me relief in every way."	H. Markwardt, Bridge St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I know that Doan's Kidney Pills are a good kidney and bladder remedy. I have used them frequently when having lame back and trouble from my kidneys. I obtained Doan's Kidney Pills from the Ivy Drug Store and they have always benefited me, removing my aches and other symptoms of kidney trouble."

Mrs. M. Olney, 300 W. Hurlburt Ave., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I consider Doan's Kidney Pills a valuable kidney remedy. I have taken them on several occasions for kidney complaint and severe backaches and have been greatly benefited. Other members of the family have used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store, for lame back and pains in the kidneys, and have had good results."	J. B. Lancaster, 203 May St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "Doan's Kidney Pills have proven a valuable remedy to me. I suffered for seven years from my kidneys. My back ached at night and when I arose in the morning I was stiff and lame. The kidney secretions passed too frequently and my rest was disturbed. I read of Doan's Kidney Pills and got them from the Ivy Drug Store. They have done a world of good. I can rest better at night, my back is stronger and my aches and pains are gone. I am pleased to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills for what they have done for me."	Mrs. John Hull, 192 W. Lincoln Ave., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I gladly recommend Doan's Kidney Pills. About a year ago I had a severe attack of rheumatism. I suffered greatly and tried many remedies, but got no relief until I took Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store. A few months ago I was again having trouble from my kidneys and had backache. I again took Doan's Kidney Pills and they acted promptly, bringing me entire relief."

FARMERS' SERVICE DEPARTMENT

All inquiries on farm subjects will be given careful and prompt attention.
 Edited by J. E. WAGGONER
 Address: I. H. C. SERVICE BUREAU
 HARVESTER BUILDING CHICAGO

WHY WASTE HUMAN EFFORT?

By J. E. Waggoner, Service Bureau Manager.

The harvest which has just passed witnessed a greater lack of farm help than perhaps any harvest that we have known. The cry for farm laborers from the Northwest, throughout the entire country, lost none of its urgency when heard at short range. Farmers boarded trains at the station offering $3.00, $2.50 per day and in some cases more for farm help. Their solicitations were met by stare and dumb silence of the passengers.

At this point one is apt to ask "why." If such is the case, and there seems to be no doubt but that it is, the farm help problem growing greater year after year. There are many reasons for this—some are far away from the farm by the attractions of the city, while others turn their backs to the farm because of the drudgery and long hours they are required to work on the ordinary farm. It is right and proper that the farmer should work long hours during certain seasons of the year in order to save the crop, but we find the largest percentage do not stop at this point, but pride themselves in early rising, saying nothing, however, of the work actually accomplished. We do not wish to discountenance early rising, but that in itself will not be productive of results. We often hear the old adage, "the early bird catches the worm"—this success was not necessarily due to early rising but to knowing where to go; in other words, the farmer should combine with early rising—early and careful planning.

Just recently the writer was on a Iowa farm where a new silo had been erected. It was discouraging to note that the silo had been built eight or ten feet from the side of the barn, in fact, it was 200 or 300 feet from the place where the silage was to be fed, viz: the cattle barn; in other words, a large percentage of the silage would have to be carried 200 or 300 feet during feeding time. The energy and time expended as a result of carelessly building the silo at this point can be placed on the "loss" side of the ledger. It is not impossible in the case that I refer to that the silo was built in a place where it would save two-thirds to three-fourths of this work.

By the use of arrangement of farm buildings hours of time and scores of miles of travel can be saved. It is much easier and usually takes no more time to unload a load of corn or grain in a crib or bin in the barn or house than it would to unload it at a corn crib standing several hundred feet from either.

If we were to visit a modern plant that is manufacturing machines for the farm or other machinery we would find that every casting and every part had a certain route through the works. The holes are bored or punched with one machine, it is then handed or delivered to the next machine where the milling or planing work is done. In other words, it passes from machine to machine until the article is completed. If the method practiced on many farms were in vogue in factories, either the price of machines would be higher or the factories would go out of business.

Conditions and methods have changed. The farmer now has at his disposal farm equipment which will enable him to reap greater profits from the area farmed if he spends part of his time planning the various operations than if the old methods were followed. He should no longer view his occupation in the light of a day-laborer, but from the angle of a business man. There is, perhaps, no occupation that requires any keener judgment and better management than to operate a farm successfully. The scarcity of farm labor can be met, in a degree, by so planning operations and growing diversified crops as to distribute the work over a longer period. There is no question but that the farmers in the northwest in wheat sections and the cotton farmers of the south will soon realize the importance and necessity, not only from the standpoint of its effect on the set but from the viewpoint of the laborer, to practice better and more complete rotations.

Data collected by the government shows that the yearly earnings per farm hand is almost directly proportional to the farm equipment used. The using of a larger number of farm machines and more power, and following better plans, including a proper rotation of crops, will help to solve the labor problem.

STABLE MANURE

Undoubtedly some stable manure has accumulated about the buildings during the rush of harvest, threshing and corn picking. It is a good plan to get this out onto the field just as soon as possible. If there come a few nice days after corn husking you will find it advantageous to use this cleaning-up-the-yard.

If the stable manure is allowed to stand in piles during the winter months a great deal of its value is lost by leaching. It is a common thing to see piles of stable manure steaming during the winter months. This is due to heat from the pile and if it were possible for us to see just what was taking place we would find that nitrogen was escaping. As nitrogen is one of the most important plant food elements, it is a good plan to follow methods of handling the manure so as not to lose it. An ordinary load of stable manure will contain about 10 pounds of nitrogen, which is bought on the market in a commercial form will cost 25 cents a pound. Not only is the nitrogen escaping, but the vegetable matter which is so important in many soils is being destroyed by burning.

The summer's accumulation of manure can be conveniently and profitably applied to winter wheat or to a meadow which we expect to put into corn next year. It is not advisable to apply manure at this time of the season on hillside or where it is apt to be washed away. It is always advisable to apply fertilizer of this kind to the highest parts of the field.

It is very generally conceded that best returns are obtained from a light application from the fact that manure applied in this way is much easier incorporated with the soil than if spread in large quantities. The only practical way of applying manure uniformly is by the use of a manure spreader, and every farmer who raises stock should consider his farm equipment incomplete unless he has a manure spreader.

Yours very truly,
 I. H. C. SERVICE BUREAU

PROFESSOR P. G. HOLDEN

Join the I. H. C. Service Bureau

Professor P. G. Holden, the well known authority on corn, enters the employment of the International Harvester Company of America. His work will be in connection with the Service Bureau and will be strictly educational in nature.

Professor Holden is one of the few men who now stand head and shoulders above all others in educational extension work. Our experimental stations have worked for years, obtaining and collecting information along agricultural lines. The usual way of distributing this has been through bulletins and other publications, which method, although it is good, lacks the effectiveness of personal contact. In getting the facts to the farmer in an effective way, where the professor excels.

He received his early training in Michigan, later in Illinois, and developed his great extension work in the State of Iowa. It was due to his efforts that the first demonstration train was equipped and operated. He also has established county demonstration work on county poor farms, winter short courses, boys' corn clubs and other forms of extension work which have helped greatly in the development of Iowa and in placing her high among agricultural states.

Through his efforts in corn, the average increase for the period of the last eight years over the period of eight years previous, has been three bushels to the acre, thus adding millions to the wealth of Iowa.

Since the Service Bureau was organized two years ago, it has accomplished much in the field of agricultural education. It now has the demonstration farms in the south and two in the west; it has distributed good alfalfa seed in some sections of the corn belt; also published many booklets, prepared articles for the press, offered handsome prizes for the best yields of grain, has come in close contact with the rural schools, presented illustrated lectures to thousands of audiences, established fellowships and scholarships, and many other things for the advancement of agriculture.

The acquisition of Professor Holden will add greatly to the effectiveness of the Service Bureau work. Under his direction the educational work in the field will include the entire territory in which the company does business. Plans now include promoting of the growth of alfalfa throughout all sections in which it can be growing, also assisting as much as possible in the production of corn in the northwest.

The company stands ready to assist in this work in an effective way, and to co-operate with all influences and forces working for the up-building of agriculture.

"Why am I gloomy?" demanded the understrapped, sultry woman who heartlessly ignored. "Isn't it enough to make a man gloomy to be cut by the one he loves best?"

"The idea!" exclaimed the heartless girl. "I didn't even know that you shared yourself."—Catholic Standard and Times

MEN WITH GUMPTION AND THE LOG DRAG.

All That's Needed to Keep Roads in Good Condition.

Here are some of the things which have been said by various people about the work of the King split log drag on country roads. "The famous split log drags did the work." "The drag is the road maker of the future." "The good results of this process are almost beyond belief." "The split log drag is an evidence of progress." "The King split log drag is the best solution of the good roads problem yet devised." "The split log drag in becoming county is the king just now and no mistake." "King's split log drag is transforming Goodville's streets from mudholes to boulevards." "The dirtiest roads included me of the best English roads. They were quite as smooth and dust free."

The last quotation is from a letter from England and refers to the roads about Red Oak, Ia. This page might be filled with similar accounts of benefits from this cheap, homemade road drag. The above items of experience come from Massachusetts, Iowa, New York, Texas, Georgia, Illinois and Pennsylvania. A Nova Scotia paper says of it: "It not only makes the road good, but keeps it so. It gives a straight, smooth, hard, well rounded road that no other means appear to provide."

The strange thing is after more than ten years of proof as to these things that there is any road anywhere to which it can be applied that is not regularly dragged with the King road drag. The trouble is no doubt that the King drag is not patented. Nobody is interested in pushing its manufacture or sale. It costs little and cannot be made to cost any more without spoiling it. If it were so complex as to require a civil engineer to understand it and a bond issue to buy it every county in the nation would be going in debt for it. All it requires is a log, a few bolts, a team of horses and a man with gumption. The latter article is without doubt the thing oftenest wanting—Farm and Fireside.

W. R. Fox, 165 W. Washington St., Noblesville, Ind., says: "After suffering many months with kidney trouble, after trying other remedies and prescriptions, I purchased a box of Foley's Kidney Pills, which not only did me more good than any other remedies I ever used, but have positively set my kidneys right. Other members of my family have used them with similar results." Take at the first sign of kidney trouble. Ivy Drug Store. Advise your doctor. On Auction sale advertising pays.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER XIV. History.

It was characteristic of Murchell to give the world no inkling of his illness. He was supposed to be sulking over his defeat. Not until after the fact did the surgeons, unable to refuse the opportunity for self advertisement, announce that a critical operation had been performed from which there were hopes of a partial recovery. Interest in his condition persisted—extraordinarily, considering that he was out of politics.

When his convalescence permitted him to be removed to New Chelsea. That community, as you may believe, was properly excited, intrusively interested and somewhat apprehensive lest he pass unseasonably into the beyond and rob it of the distinction of being his "legal residence." John Dunmeade, as a collaborator in this disaster, was made to feel a sudden atmospheric frigidity and was led into further sorrowful reflections on the fickleness of the public. Murchell in very cautious fashion kept himself secluded from his neighbors and the stream of pilgrims that knocked at his gates. Their plaints were divers. Sherrod was too arbitrary, he was too lax, he permitted himself and his friends to shake the plum trees of the city so vigorously as to court failure of the crop, he greedily refused to divide the plums. From which it will appear that Sherrod, even thus early in his ministry, showed an incomplete mastery of the subtle science of sulking the word to the man. Murchell was urged to intervene, to resist, to destroy. For one and all he had only the irritable retort: "I am out of politics." But the pilgrimages continued.

In the midst of this uncertainty the Michigan railroad began secretly to undermine the Steel City, that hitherto impregnable fortress of the rival monarch. And John Dunmeade, an announcement was made that, whether recommended as district attorney or not, he would be a candidate, anti-Sherrod and anti-Murchell, for the gubernatorial nomination. Jerry Brent was already well into a campaign for the opposition nomination, therefore regarded as an empty honor.

We may not go so far as to declare that Miss Roberta turned the course of history. But it is certain that she was first to foresee, though not with her bones, the fork of the road. So touching were the pictures presented to her of Murchell's illness that at length, after a protracted struggle with herself, her heart relented. She filled a basket with homemade confections designed to tempt the appetite of the most jaded invalid. This basket on her arm, she set out, on a day when the March wind blustered and stung her face, toward Murchell's home.

She found Murchell reading before an open fire, his cheeks slightly pale and sunken, but his eyes clear and bright. He rose, with an ease that did not betoken approaching dissolution, to relieve her of the basket, shaking hands warmly.

"I'm very glad to see you, Roberta. Take a chair."

She seated herself primly. "You don't look as bad as they say." She observed him suspiciously.

"Roberta," he said ingratiatingly, "the doctors tell me that even with

"Did you bring all these for me, Roberta?"

the best of care I can live only a few years and that's thanks to my good constitution."

"A few years," she sniffed. "What did you expect at your time of life?"

He thought it well to change the subject and hurriedly leaned over, raised the napkin and peered into the basket.

"Why? Did you bring all these for me, Roberta? That was very thoughtful of you."

"I guess you don't need them. Pretending to be sick to get people's sympathy because you've been beaten."

He smiled, not in amusement, at her asperity. "It's like you to cover up a kind act with sharp words. What an essence the men had that you wouldn't marry!"

"There weren't any to escape."

"Yes, there were. I remember that. You were what they call a beauty. weren't you? Why," he asked in sudden earnestness, "didn't you marry some one of them?"

"Because," she said simply, "you were too busy being in love with Ann Dunmeade to notice me."

"Eh? I—why, Roberta?" He stared at her blankly. Then his manner quickly softened. She perceived the change and drew herself up even more stiffly. If that were possible, her lips straightened in a severe, thin line.

"You needn't be sorry for me. I have been glad I escaped, ever since I found out the kind of man you were. I'd have made a man out of you."

"I guess," he smiled grimly, "you'd have found it a hard job, as you seem to measure men. But I guess you could have, if any one could."

She turned on him in a little unexpected gust of fierceness. "But not the kind of man you are! Not a coward and to quit fighting the very thing you are beaten. I thought you were one when you left your regiment before Gettysburg, but I excused you on the plea that we needed men at home too. But now—"

Her unfinished sentence was eloquent.

His astonishment was genuine. "But I believed you thought me a bad man! You ought to be glad I was beaten."

"But John says you're a better man than Sherrod."

"Only," Murchell amended, shrewdly guessing, "he put it that Sherrod is a worse man than I am, didn't he? I don't believe I'm a coward. A few months ago I did intend to quit—I was very tired and my skeleton was coming on. But now—Roberta, can you keep a secret?"

"I've kept one for forty years."

"So you have! Well, the other day I got my doctor to tell me the things I must eat and must not eat to keep alive as long as possible and then told him to go to the devil. Roberta, it was the first time I've sworn since I joined the church."

Miss Roberta kept her smiles for rare occasions. "I wish I could have heard you." Which concession she immediately negated by adding, "I suppose you're going to do the same kind of thing over again."

"Roberta, you're the most consistent inconsistent person in the world. You mean am I going to turn reformer? You can't teach an old dog new tricks."

"Not if he doesn't want to learn, I expect."

She rose to go. He followed her as a simple, though arising for to remain she went a few steps toward the door, then suddenly turned and walked back to face him.

"Why don't you help John?"

It was his turn to stiffen angrily. "You ask that after the way he attacked me and created a sentiment against me that paved the way for Sherrod to beat me? He's responsible for Sherrod's getting on top; do you know that? I gave him a chance six years ago, and he wouldn't take it. He will do nothing for him."

"And besides," he added more and more firmly, "he wouldn't let me help him in the only way I could."

"I wasn't thinking of him. He doesn't need you. You need him."

His astonishment was genuine as she left. He went to a window where he could watch her, still stiffly upright as a grenadier, breathing the March air. He tried to recall how she had appeared when she was young, for she, too, all unknown to him, must have marked a phase in the life of the young man who once had been. When she had passed out of sight he returned to his chair.

His book was forgotten.

The Hon. G. Washington Jenkins had been of the faithful at a time when heresy was profitable; hence his tall, Lincoln-like figure was one of the few that were not turned inhospitably away from Murchell's door.

He was in New Chelsea a few days after Miss Roberta's neighborly errand. "Wash," asked the senator abruptly, "how'd you like to be a candidate for governor?"

"I'd like it," and Wash honestly.

"Suppose," Murchell suggested, "you begin a campaign for delegates. We could use the delegates, even if we couldn't use you," he added thoughtfully.

The congressman smiled faintly. They discussed the matter at length.

As Jenkins was leaving, his host remarked earnestly, "Hereafter consult only with Greene. Don't come here. I'm out of politics."

Neither gentleman smiled.

When the Honorable Jenkins returned to Washington, he reluctantly admitted to an interrogative reporter: "No, I'm afraid the senator is in a bad way. I don't think he'll ever go back into politics."

Of John Heath you have never heard. A red and unsung until this hour, he remained in that shadowycurity far which he was designated, and no man ever saw him.

It was at a crucial time for those whom this chronicle concerns when Jerry Brent and John Dunmeade were marching from Dan to Beersheba and back and laboring, with a particular worthy of larger results, to rally the slender hosts of reform when Stephen Hampden was riding his all in.

wild throw for vast fortune and Warren Blake was following that daring example; when the Consolidated Coal company was making many happy by declaring a dividend of 7 percent.

In the kingdom things were awry. The rival monarch was thundering at the gates. Worse still, there was disaffection in the very source of dominion, in the army. And the minister in power chose this hour to get drunk. Anxious chances were being cast toward the deposed minister in his self-exacted exile. Royal messengers were being sent galloping post-haste to him to urge him, with due unconscious irony, for the sake of peace, to speak the word that would restore concord among the mutinous regiments. But the ominous silence continued unbroken.

At such a juncture, we say, John Heath stepped in to deflect the course of history.

Came to the exile, not many days after Miss Roberta, a messenger not under royal seal. Secretary, we may call him to the new minister, having curried favor by desertion of the old. He was visibly perturbed and would not desert from his importunities until admitted to the presence of the exile. Even then, such was his feverish haste, he did not notice in his host, as Miss Roberta, had done, a vigor inconsistent with certain rumors rife. He plunged at once into the matter in hand.

"We've got Sherrod locked up in a room at the hotel. He's drunk as a lord and threatens to throw himself into the river."

"Well—let him!" said Murchell, grimly heartless.

"But," cried the messenger, "it may be something to bring on a revolution that will sweep us all—Sherrod, Parrott, me—out of the face of the earth."

"I," responded Murchell calmly, "am out of politics and don't care. What do you want me to do?"

"Come with me to the capital, and what's wrong and straighten it out."

"Go to Parrott."

"Parrott's a fourflusher. This is critical."

"I won't do it. It's trouble of your own making. Get yourselves out of it."

The messenger sprang to his feet and began to pace the floor swiftly. He assumed to instruct a master. With wild gesticulation and passionate phrase he sketched the impending calamity. The times were ripe for a revolution. These unmitigated fools, Dunmeade and Brent, with their incessant click about bosses and graft were getting the people stirred up. There was trouble in the air—he, the speaker, could feel it. The organization was falling to pieces.

"Do you think," Murchell inquired calmly, "Sherrod's short in his accounts?"

"I don't know. There are books I can't see without exciting suspicion. And I can't get nothing out of him."

The swift pacing ceased abruptly. The messenger confronted Murchell.

"What," he demanded, "is John Heath?"

"I don't know," answered Murchell truthfully.

"Within less than two years he has received from the state more than one hundred thousand dollars for special services."

"Nine hundred thousand dollars. What is John Heath?"

"I don't know. But I think he may be a—"

The messenger dropped into his chair, helping himself, unmolested, to a cigar. Murchell, as though taking up a man that the other had left unfinished, rose and in his turn began to pace the floor. After a few minutes he went out of the room, still without speaking. He did not reappear for almost a quarter of an hour. But then he wore a hat and an overcoat and was carrying a light leather grip.

"Come along," he commanded, "the bank's waiting."

The guest went along with alacrity. When they had reached the Steel City and had changed cars for the engine train Murchell went to their station and was soon, to all outward appearances, sound asleep.

At that mystic hour which we are told is the darkest of all two men were sitting in a hotel room. One, Watkins, sat stretched out before the dying fire, yawning, rising for the sleep of which twenty-four hours' guard duty had robbed him. A litter of newspapers on the floor around him showed how he had beguiled the slow vigil. The other, Sherrod, was slouched in a rocker by the table, head drooped forward on his breast and hands hanging inertly at his sides. The red rimmed eyeballs were half closed. Drunk evidently, and more than that. Occasionally his lips moved; senseless mutterings came from them.

Steps along the hall, and there was a guarded knock at the door. He opened a cautious crack, peeped out and then threw it open eagerly. Murchell and the messenger entered. Watkins seized Murchell's hand joyfully.

"Thank the Lord!" he exclaimed. "I couldn't have stood it much longer."

Sherrod seemed to hear the words. He opened his eyes and stared at the newcomers glassily. Then a lightning flash of intelligence seemed to penetrate his stupor.

"Murchell!"

He managed to stagger to his feet. Then a last wave of drunkenness swept over him. He fell, sprawling, unconscious on the floor.

"He ought," said Murchell, "to have a Turkish bath."

Order for Publication.

State of Michigan. The probate court for the county of Charlevoix.

At a session of said court, held at the probate office in the city of Charlevoix in said county, on the 24th day of January A. D. 1913.

Present: Hon. Serepta A. Correll, Judge of Probate. In the matter of the estate of Nabel U. Dreher deceased. Wm. H. Dreher, executor, filed in said court his petition praying that the administration of said estate be granted to Robert W. Kane or to some other suitable person.

It is ordered, That the 15th day of February A. D. 1913, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, at said probate office, be and is hereby appointed for hearing said petition. It is further ordered, That public notice thereof be given by publication at a copy of this order, for three successive weeks previous to said day of hearing, in the Charlevoix Courier, a newspaper published and circulated in said county.

SEREPTA A. CORRELL, Judge of Probate.

MOTION HEARD FOR TRIAL

Swift Matter Was Argued Before Judge Mayne Last Friday.

Governor Ferris, in an interview indicates That There is Little Hope of Pardon.

Last week the motion for a new trial in the Swift case was argued before Judge Mayne. Further testimony on the argument made by Swift's attorney, R. N. Clark, will be heard by the judge before a decision is rendered.

In a recent interview Governor Ferris is reported as saying: "I am being pressured to death just now by persons trying to get me to pardon Herman Swift. Now I won't listen to most of the pleas I receive relative to him. There is no man in the world. There is no excuse why he should have committed the crime of which he was convicted, if he committed it. I refuse absolutely to see any mitigating circumstances in his case. If they can prove he never committed the offense, that is one thing, but if he committed it, there was no excuse, and he will be obliged to serve his term out for anything I will do to prevent it."

From the above it will be seen it is up to Swift to prove his innocence in a hurry if he avoids punishment for the crime of which he was convicted in this court.

Like the governor Charlevoix county is getting tired of the Swift case and while they all desire that he be given every chance to prove his innocence, the general opinion is that he has been given every opportunity and the law should now take its course.

INJURED IN AUTO ACCIDENT

Harry A. Dodge, formerly of this City, in Collision in Philadelphia.

Harry A. Dodge, formerly of this city, now of Philadelphia, writes home about a collision between a street car and auto January 10.

The auto, in which Harry was a passenger, while going at a speed of about twenty-five miles an hour, skidded and got mixed up with the car. The auto was a total wreck. The driver escaped injury but Harry and the two other occupants were injured, Harry receiving several severe bruises about the head and face. Harry writes that he is quite sore but is glad he is on earth.

THE PROBLEM OF GOOD ROADS

Co-operation Only Remedy For Present Conditions.

MUST USE THE LOG DRAG.

Long and Consistent Work With This Simple Instrument Will Work Wonders—Watch the Crown—Drainage Important in Dirt Roads.

The good roads problem would be no problem at all if the people as a whole would work together. It is just as much in the interest of the city as the farmer.

There is no influence that encourages community improvement and rural development more than good roads. You or I would rather haul a load ten miles over a good road than five miles over a bad one.

A bad one. Good roads bring the market nearer to the farm and make the farm more desirable. In turn good roads enlarge the trade territory of the town. A country home out from the city five miles over a well kept road is really nearer than one situated considerably closer which is reached over a bad road. Fifteen miles is not a long drive over a finely kept highway. It is prohibitive through truck or over a rutted, lumpy, rick-racking, unkept for way.

The road drag is the one implement at hand that will make and keep good roads at a low cost. A road drag can be made at an expense of less than $2 in material and labor, and it will do more work and better work than any grader at any cost. It will operate with one man and a team, and a grader requires three teams and as many men at least. If all the money that is spent on the grader to the detriment of the road was put into dragging there would be a great improvement in the highways. Because a township has a grader on hand is no reason or excuse for using it to beat up and ruin roads.

A perfect dirt road can't be made with a drag in a day or a week and scarcely in a year, but long and consistent use of it is bound to make a good road finally. The main trouble now with the drag is that it is used only spasmodically in many cases and then not at the right time. There is a certain time after a rain when it is used and is not entirely dried and yet is in shape to be dragged into the ruts and uneven places of the grade. In this condition it punks like potty, and travel on it beats hell until it is almost as hard as a pavement and practically impervious to water. When the roads are dragged before they are dry there are no little humps to be ground into dust.

The making and keeping of the proper crown on the roads are another matter that should be given close consideration. After dragging the roads a long time, the center of the highway may become too full. This condition has not been reached generally, but it may be. It is then time to turn the drag and throw the dirt out from the center toward the edges.

A roadway well drained at the sides and treated with the drag consistently faithfully and scientifically will never get very bad. It will be excellent to drive over eleven and one-half months of the year.—Road Maker.

A PRAYER FOR THE BABIES.

(Written for the Milk and Baby Hygiene Association of Michigan.)

O God, since thou hast laid the little children into our arms in utter helplessness, with no protection save our love, we pray that the sweet appeal of their baby hands may not be in vain. Let no innocent life in our city be quenched again in useless pain through our ignorance and sin. May we who are mothers or fathers seek eagerly to join wisdom to our love, lest love itself be deadly when unguided by knowledge. Bless the doctors and nurses and all the friends of men, who are giving of their skill and devotion to the care of our children. If there are any who were kissed by love in their own infancy, but who have no child to whom they may give as they have received, grant them such largeness of sympathy that they may rejoice to pay their debt in full to all children who have need of them. Forgive us, our Father, for the thoughtlessness of the past. Grant us great tenderness for all babies who suffer and a growing sense of the divine mystery, that is brooding in the soul of every child. Amen.

HOW TO BUILD A GOOD SAND-CLAY ROAD

Blending of Materials Is a Difficult Problem.

It's a mighty good thing to know how to build a good sand-clay road.

These materials are used when the road consists of too much sand or too much clay for satisfactory road material. A sand road is best when it is wet and worst when dry and a clay road worst when wet and best when dry. The proper blending of these two materials, therefore, tends to overcome these objections.

The materials must be carefully proportioned and thoroughly mixed. If there is an excess of sand more binding material should be added in the form of clay, and if there is too much clay water has a softening effect and the road becomes sticky and wears into ruts. All clays will not serve for this purpose, since some tend to disintegrate and crumble when dry. A plastic clay with binding and cementing qualities is needed.

The material must first be graded and drained. If the predominant material is sand, then clay should be spread over the surface at the desired width, the depth being regulated by the judgment of the roadmaker and the efficiency of the mixture determined by experimentation. After the amount deemed sufficient has been added use the plow and disk to thoroughly mix the two ingredients, drag the surface smooth and pack it either with the roller or by travel. Best results are obtained if this mixing and packing is done while the road is wet, and it will frequently pay to wait for rain to do this.

If an excess of either clay or sand appears add more of the lacking element and keep working the road. It may take a few months to make a road which will bear the traffic. Where the amount of clay or sand, as the case may be, to be added is not great mixing and rolling may sometimes be dispensed with, the natural effect of travel being to perform this work. Results will be slower, however, and probably not so satisfactory.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Prizes For Road Builders.

A road working campaign of three days on the road between West Plains and Frontville, Mo., was concluded when several hundred dollars' worth of merchandise and cash were distributed as prizes to the best workers. The twelve miles was divided into seven divisions, with an overseer and timekeeper over each crew, the entire force being under the command of Colonel Jay L. Torrey and County Highway Engineer T. Taylor. Miss Della Smith of Frontville won an important class not donated by Colonel Torrey to the young lady who had the most bonus working. Farmers organized an improvement association to keep up the road, beautify farm homes, paint and whitewash buildings, cut underbrush and make the homes as attractive as possible. The mayor presided at the Commercial club, county candidates and business men from West Plains assisted.

Do You Know Anything About CHIROPRACTIC

Chiropractic (Ki-ro-prak-tik) is the science of adjusting the subluxations (displacements) in the spinal column, commonly called the backbone, for the purpose of removing pressure from the nerves. The spinal column is the only place nerves pass between hard bony surfaces, that are MOVABLE, therefore, practically the only place nerves can be impinged or the nerve restricted, and it matters not what part of the body or organ is affected, the CAUSE is in the spinal column. I ask no questions, simply analyze the spine and I tell you every place you are affected. Chiropractic is the only science that REMOVES THE CAUSE of disease and is done without pain, drugs or knife, I use nothing, but my hands. The whole object is accomplished when the nerve is released.

I do not TREAT, I remove the CAUSE, nature cures.

Analysis and Consultation free. Let me tell you where you are affected by analyzing your spine. Because it is new do not say "it is impossible."

I guarantee to cure any case I take charge of or it will cost you nothing. All I ask is a chance, and I will cure you of your trouble.

RIGHTLY CALLED RURAL Y. M. C. A.

Says Secretary Ball of the Newly Formed County Organization.

BEGAN WORK JANUARY 15

Interesting Letter Giving History of the Rural Y. M. C. A. Movement.

Michigan Leads With the Largest Number of County Organizations With Twelve Plans of the Work Explained.

Often it is called the county Y. M. C. A., but this is a misnomer and while we are just beginning this work in Charlevoix county it might be well to get the habit of calling the organization by its right name, but while the technical name of the organization may be of just passing interest you are definitely interested in knowing why the organization happened; where the idea originated; and why Charlevoix county happened to be one of the fortunate counties to be organized.

Then, first we will consider why the organization happened. If just one general answer would suffice it might be said that the rural Y. M. C. A. happened because about ninety per cent of the boys of America are raised in the open country, the villages and the small towns. The foregoing statement is only a part of the answer however. When Sir George Williams of London, England, organized a group of fellows and gradually developed the organization which has since been known as the Young Men's Christian Association he planned for the boys with city needs giving no thought to the villages, towns or open country. Later on when the work was started in America it met with wonderful success and interested men in the smaller communities said, "We also, will provide Y. M. C. A. privileges for the boys of our town." Plans were made, financial canvasses carried on, buildings constructed and secretaries employed. In the New England states the weather does not change one-half as fast as this country and the weather failed. And these failures came not because of a lack of real interest or consistent effort but because the small town was not the proper soil for the organization. Failures have happened in the East, West, North and South and numerous times in all four places before the people were convinced that the city pattern made too large a unit for the small towns. Following the arrival of this decision some time elapsed before the present rural Y. M. C. A. plan was perfected.

When the idea of rural Y. M. C. A. work with the county as a unit of organization organized work will be next considered without going very much into details. Robert Weidman, "the father of rural Y. M. C. A. work" as well as the father of all departmental work of the association, organized the first rural Y. M. C. A. work in DePue township, Will county, Illinois, in 1872. The next year a business man in Mason county, Illinois, voluntarily undertook the supervision of the work in seven or eight small communities and from that it was an easy step to the employment of a secretary to give his entire time in supervising the work of an entire community. Small town work developed here and in other parts of the United States and Canada but the rural Y. M. C. A. work was not recognized as a department by the international committee until 1900. At present there are 69 organized counties and provinces, Michigan, leading with the largest number, has only twelve. The organized Michigan counties follow in the order of their organization: Allegan, Eaton, Hillsdale, St. Joseph, Clinton, Ionia, Cuthbert, Sanilac, Gratiot, Charlevoix and Branch.

Just why Charlevoix county should wait six years before calling on the state Y. M. C. A. committee for the services of Mr. C. L. Rowe, secretary of the department of rural Y. M. C. A. work, is of little concern now. The fortunate thing is that the county is now organized, due to the fact that some interested men took time to consider the need definitely and to secure the services and experience of an organization that had perfected the above mentioned plan. The work of Mr. Rowe and his assistants coupled with that of the men in the county culminated in a banquet held at Boyne City during the latter part of October when the organization was formally launched and the following committees elected and instructed to secure a secretary to proceed with the work. Chairman, A. L. Coulter; vice-chairman, W. I. Pearson; clerk, John I. Porter; treasurer, S. C. Smith; executive committee, W. S. Shaw, W. H. White, R. W. Kane, A. Butts and W. P. Porter. On the 27th of December the committee met in Boyne City and arranged with A. Bruce Hall of Allegan county to take charge of the work and he took up his new duties on the 28th day of January with headquarters at the Wolverine hotel in Boyne City.

L. D. BARTHOLOMEW IS DEAD

Passed Away in Corpus Christi Texas Wednesday of Last Week.

WAS PIONEER OF CHARLEVOIX

Established Second Mercantile Business in This City in 1873.

Was Prominent in All Movements for the Development of City and County—Will be Greatly Missed Here.

As we went to press last week word had just been received of the serious illness of L. D. Bartholomew at Corpus Christi, Texas, where he was spending the winter. A later telegram announced his death. Lemuel D. Bartholomew was born in Geneva, Ashtabula county, Ohio, February 25, 1836. The Bartholomew's were numbered among the first four families to locate in Ashtabula county in 1800, and Mr. Bartholomew's father continued until his death to be identified with agricultural pursuits in that section until his death.

L. D. Bartholomew passed his boyhood upon the farm, securing his early education in the common schools and at Kingsville Academy. At the age of seventeen he went to Wisconsin, where he remained one year, then locating in Monroeville, Illinois, where he secured employment as clerk in a mercantile establishment. He continued to reside in Illinois for six years, when he removed to Albion, this state, and engaged in the nursery and fruit business, later going to Spring Lake where he devoted his attention to the handling of peach stock, practically initiating the enterprise of peach growing in that section of Michigan's far famed peach belt. In 1872 on account of impaired health he disposed of his interests in Spring Lake and made a trip to Kansas, afterward coming to this section on advice of his physician. The summer of 1873 was spent in California after which Mr. Bartholomew came to this city where he entered into partnership with Egbert Carpenter, in general mercantile business, their store being the second in the city.

Mr. Bartholomew also engaged in the business of handling wood products, owning a vessel and shipping to Milwaukee and Chicago. He also owned a small passenger steamer plying between this city and Boyne City and East Jordan. After continuing in the general store for about ten years, he established himself in the hardware and agricultural implement business, selling a half interest in the business two years later to Forrest S. Blanchard, the partnership continuing until about four years ago when Mr. Bartholomew retired from the business, since when he has devoted his attention to his various business investments. In politics Mr. Bartholomew was a staunch democrat. He refused

CANDIDATES MUST SOON HAVE THEIR PETITIONS FILED

Time for Candidates for County Road Commissioners Will Expire February 3--Candidates for City Offices Must Have Petitions in Hands of City Clerk February 12--Other Requirements of the Law.

Although the primary election is still several weeks away it is getting time for those who seek office to file their petitions with the city or county clerk.

The attorney general has ruled that the office of county road commissioner must be filled by holding a primary election for the nomination blanks for this office must be filled out and filed with the county clerk on or before February 3.

Nominations for city offices must be filed with the city clerk on or before four o'clock February 12. Petitions for nomination for county offices must be signed by a number of enrolled voters, who are enrolled in the party enrollment of said party and who reside in the county, equal to not less than two per centum nor more than four per centum of the number of votes cast in such county for secretary of state in the last preceding November election. The same applies to candidates for city offices only the petitioners must reside in the city or ward in which the candidate resides.

To obtain the printing of the name of any candidate on the official ballot for the April election such candidate must receive not less than fifteen per centum of the total vote cast at the last preceding November election for Secretary of State by his political party.

The total vote cast in Charlevoix county for Secretary of State was: republican, 153; democratic, 610; progressive, 988; socialist, 404; prohibitionist, 46; socialist labor, 5. In the city the vote stood: republican, 430; democratic, 143; progressive, 146.

the position of village president but served as justice of the peace, member of the board of education and member of the board of public works. Fraternally he was a member of Round Lake Lodge I. O. O. F., of which he was a charter member and first Noble Grand.

He was married December 11, 1869, at Albion to Miss Mary L. Blanchard, who, with three children, Forrest L. of Chicago, Mrs. Thomas A. Robinson of Atlanta, Georgia, and Mrs. Winifred Carr of Yuma, Arizona, survive.

Mr. Bartholomew was one of our most highly respected citizens who did much for the development of this section and his death will come as a personal loss to the many who have been the recipients of acts of kindness from his hands. Of late years he has spent his winters in the south, returning to Charlevoix in the summer and no man will be missed more in the entire county. The funeral will be held from the Congregational church under the auspices of the I. O. O. F.

HON. WILLIAM L. CURTIS

Prominent Resident of Petoskey Passes Away at Ann Arbor Friday.

Hon. William L. Curtis, one of the most prominent citizens of Petoskey, died at Ann Arbor Friday morning, following an operation which was performed about twelve weeks ago.

Mr. Curtis was born in Kalamazoo county in 1812 and after filling several important positions in his native county, removed to Petoskey in 1882, where he entered the banking business, in which he has since continued in connection with extensive real estate and timber interests in this and other states.

Politically Mr. Curtis was a Republican and besides occupying important local offices, had represented his district in the upper and lower house. Fraternally he was a member of the Masonic order.

He leaves a wife and four sons, one daughter having died in infancy.

FOR SUPREME COURT

Judge Wayne's Name Will be Presented to the Republican Convention.

Judge F. W. Wayne has announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for Justice of the Supreme Court, and is receiving assurances of support from all parts of the state.

The judge has during his incumbency of the bench in this circuit, gained the reputation of being an able, impartial jurist, having had a remarkably small number of adverse decisions recorded against him by the supreme court, and if nominated and elected, would fill the position with credit to the party, the state and Charlevoix county.

COMMITTS SUICIDE

Grant W. Richert of This City Takes Carbolic Acid Saturday.

Saturday afternoon Grant W. Richert, who lived in the north part of the city, committed suicide by taking carbolic acid.

The facts in the case seem to be as follows: Richert has been absent for several weeks in different cities south of here working at his trade of capework. While in an intoxicated condition he forged some papers. Friday night he came home, and with the fear of his apprehension in his mind took the poison Saturday, leaving a note behind explaining his act.

Coroner Wilkinson was called but in view of the above, decided an inquest was unnecessary.

The unfortunate man leaves a wife and four daughters. The body was taken to Kalkaska Monday for burial.

TOUR OF INSPECTION PLANNED

Of the Proposed Route of West Michigan Lake Shore Highway.

Officials in Autos Will Join the Procession as it Passes Through.

The Hon. Frank Hamilton, the Grand Traverse vice president of West Michigan Good Roads association, proposes an inspection trip over the West Michigan Lake Shore Highway for the early summer. The general features of his plan call for a careful examination of the highway from the Indiana line to Straits of Mackinac. Two or more autos are to start northward from the state line at a prearranged time, making an important city or village to each county and in each case, the original party will be joined by two or more autos filled with county road officials, supervisors and such others as are interested in the establishment of the lake shore highway.

The counties that will be crossed are: Berrien, Van Buren, Allegan, Ottawa, Muskegon, Oceana, Mason, Manistee, Benzie, Grand Traverse, Antrim, Kalkaska, Charlevoix and Emmet. At Mackinac City a "better roads" meeting will be held and a suitable program carried out. On the return journey the representatives of the several counties will drop out as their respective counties are reached.

The good men of each county will be asked to complete as soon as possible the unfinished miles across their counties and in cases where there are two good highways it will be possible to use one going and the other returning.

As soon as the details of the schedule have been completed the plan will be submitted to the association for modification and approval.

IN THE TOILS

Two Boyne City Men Arrested Last Week on Serious Charges.

William Henry Hall a well known Boyne City drayman, was arrested last week on complaint of County Agent Madison, charged with taking improper liberties with Anna Buckner, a fourteen year old girl of that city. The girl was taken to East Jordan by Mr. Madison. The hearing in the case was held Friday before Justice McCalmont of East Jordan and Hall was bound over to the circuit court for trial on bonds of $1,000.

Saturday morning Louis Melosh, a milkman of the same city was arrested on the same charge and taken to East Jordan where he waived examination and was bound over to the circuit court for trial.

Change of Time.

Monday the change of time on the Pere Marquette took effect as follows: Trains from the south will arrive in Charlevoix at 9:50 a. m. and p. m., the trains from the north will arrive at the same time as formerly.

Poultry, Eggs and Sugar Show an Enormous Increase in Value—Other Important Statistics Given.

Statistics for products for Michigan are presented in a bulletin soon to be issued by the bureau of census, department of commerce and labor, prepared by John Lee Coulter.

The number of farms in Michigan reporting dairy cows on April 15, 1910, was 183,088, but only 168,380 reported dairy products in 1900. Doubtless some farmers who had dairy cows in 1910 had none in 1900, while other farmers neglected to give information for the preceding year.

Hutter made on Michigan farms in 1909 was valued at $11,805,000.

The total number of sheep of shearing age in Michigan on April 15, 1910, was 1,315,000, representing a decrease of 5 per cent, as compared with the number on June 1, 1900 (1,382,000).

The approximate production of wool during 1909 was 1,506,000 fleeces, weighing 11,965,000 pounds, and valued at $3,428,000. The number of fleeces produced in 1909 was 8 per cent less than in 1899. The average weight per fleece in 1909 was 7.5 pounds, as compared with 7 pounds in 1899 and the average value per pound was 29 cents, as compared with 20 cents in 1899.

The total number of fowls on Michigan farms on April 15, 1910, was 1,967,000. The production of eggs actually reported for the year 1909 was 56,177,000 dozens, valued at $11,062,000. According to the twelfth census reports the production of eggs in 1899 was 51,183,000 dozens, the value being $10,100,000.

The total value of domestic animals sold in 1909 was $45,915,000, and that of animals slaughtered on farms $7,652,000, making an aggregate of $53,567,000. This total, however, involves considerable duplication, resulting from the resale or slaughter of animals which had been purchased by the farmers during the same year.

The combined acreage of crops for which acreage was reported was $4,198,578, representing 63.3 per cent of the total improved land in farms (12,832,058). Most of the remaining improved land doubtless consisted of improved pasture, land lying fallow, house and farm yards, and land occupied by orchards and vineyards, the acreage of which is not reported.

The general character of Michigan agriculture is indicated by the fact that more than one-fifth (43.5 per cent) of the total value of crops in 1909 was contributed by cereals, more than one-fifth (22.2 per cent) by hay and forage, and one-tenth (10 per cent) by potatoes and other vegetables. The remainder, representing in value 24.3 per cent of the total, consisted mainly of grains and seeds (and other than cereals), of fruits and nuts, and of forest products.

The total value of crops in 1909 was 71.9 per cent greater than that in 1899; this increase was clearly due to high prices.

In 1909 the total acreage of potatoes and other vegetables was 456,368 and their value $16,201,000.

Strawberries are by far the most important of the small fruits raised in Michigan, with raspberries and loganberries ranking next. The value of the strawberry crop in 1909 was $1,000,887; of raspberries and loganberries $905,019. The total acreage of small fruits in 1909 was 21,110, and in 1899, 20,197, a decrease of 2.6 per cent. The production in 1909 was 27,235,000 quarts, as compared with 10,168,000 quarts in 1899, and the value $2,025,000, as compared with $1,880,000.

The total value of maple sugar and syrup produced in 1909 was $341,000, as compared with $101,000 in 1899.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER XV.

John Heath Makes Restitution.

TEN hours later Sherrod opened his eyes. He started up, with a groan, and beheld the man who sat by the window. The man—Murchell—heard the movement and came to the bedside. He stood looking down pitilessly at the half recumbent sick man. Sherrod stared back, with bewildered, fearful eyes, for a moment. Then, with another groan, he fell back. His parched lips tried to frame a question, but nothing came of the effort save a dry, croaking sound.

Then Murchell spoke. "Who," he demanded, "is John Heath?"

A spasm of fear even more acute contracted Sherrod's face.

"Who," Murchell repeated, still in the pitiless tone, "who is John Heath?"

"He is—the political account."

"Of which you're the receiving end?"

Sherrod's lips formed a smile.

"Yes."

"How much are you short?"

"Nine hundred thousand dollars."

"What have you got to show for it?"

"Some securities—all stocks."

"Worth what?"

"Three hundred thousand—about."

"I don't know—exactly."

"In my private safe at the office."

Murchell turned sharply and left the room. Almost at once he was back, accompanied by Watkins. "Give Watkins the combination," he commanded.

There was another moment of hesitation, of inward struggle. But a great lay overnight. Philip Wilder was under a monarch, to be sure, but he was a prince of the blood, and he ruled over a province of street railways. Many things did this princely gentleman desire, and for them he was willing to pay—the least price that must be paid.

He, like Miss Roberta and Watkins, was astounded when he beheld, not a shuffling, harmless shadow, but a man who showed the marks of a man's last terring, yet was clear minded, hale and henry, who had not forgotten how to drive a close bargain, who knew exactly what he wanted and who got it.

So pleased was he by his discovery that the next morning, breaking a solemn promise to Murchell, he reported it to Sackett. "Richard," he declared,
"is himself again."

But by that time Murchell was well on his way back to the capital.

A rumor that the once great politician was on the train quickly spread among the passengers, and many of them found occasion to stroll past his seat. But there was no visible ripple of emotion to betray to their curious eyes the swelling sense of triumph within him.

When his energy slipped up by the sickness, the seriousness of which he did not yet realize, he had confronted Sackett and declared his purpose to quit, he had spoken in all truth; but,
the operation over and strength creeping back into the body whose tissues and bones living had never devitalized the hunger, the need for action reas-serted itself.

Hence he planned, not consciously to rescue his old power and responsibility, but from his estate in the forest to make sudden, unexpected forays to harness those who had deprived him of his glory.

Then came the opportunity to wreak the sweetest of all revenge, to save those who had thrown him over, to torture his enemy with the sense of inferiority and obligation, perhaps—the warrior soul longed—to make of revenge also a lever to open the gates in the road back to su-premaccy.

Under the stimulus of sharp, sensational, he felt almost the strength of his prime. Wilder whom struck from rail and road, a triumph in which his soul joined the mad, exultant shout of the viking returning victoriously.

But he found a Sherrod who had had time to think, to measure the situation, who had recovered his nerve. And of Sherrod this may be written: he was a great fighter, cunning and daring, conscienceless, proud, disloyal—yes,
but even his treacheries were accomplished with a certain reckless grace, and decision that gave them the semblance of the born master's instinctive strategy. And he had what Murchell had not, a personal magnitude that often won faith even where interest failed; though he lacked what made Murchell great, intellectuality and self control.

Coward he was not. At most any man, beaten by the same knowledge of crime and punishment discovery, with so much to lose, would have suffered a lapse from courage.
But the hour of clinging and weakness was past.

Murchell found him in the same hotel room, through the open windows of which a biting wind had swept the last trace of the fabled fumes of tobacco and whisky. Murchell carefully closed and locked the door and, without speaking, sat down across the table from him. Sherrod's eyes, cool, not defiant, but aggressively, menacing almost, locked with Murchell's steady ones.

"Well?" The voice was cool.

"I want to know," said Murchell, almost in a whisper. "He is selling your securities today at the market.
He will send you the balance. Tomorrow a man will come with the cash."

"And in return?" Sherrod knew the price.

"He wants some charters in Adelphi-a and some traction legislation. He will explain in detail when you see him. I have promised him what he wants.
You will see that he gets it."

"Yes. The balance—you say it is a loan. How am I to repay?"

"That is for you to say," Murchell paused, then added, "I understand banks are still paying for the privilege of state deposits."

"How much do Payne and Watkins know?"

"As much as I guessed."

"Can you keep their mouths shut?"

Again silence, broken first by Sherrod. His lips twisted in a faint smile.

"Are you waiting for my gratitude?"

"I have none. I'm sick still, but I'm not afraid, as I was yesterday, and I understand the situation. You haven't done this for me."

"Is there any reason why I should do it for you?"

Sherrod began to feel that he could no longer endure the other's contemptuous, relentless gaze—that, in spite of his will, his own was wavering. The coolness vanished. He almost lisped out his words.

"You came here expecting to gloat over me, didn't you? You think because you've caught me with the goods on you're a superior being. You needn't. Everything I am, Bill Murchell, you are. I suppose when you were sick you had the person around to pray over you, didn't you? When you were praying did you tell the person how you got to be so rich?"

"At least," Murchell said quietly, "I didn't steal it from the treasury of the state."

Under the taunt Sherrod seemed to lose all hold on himself. He sprang to his feet. His face was convulsed.
His voice and the pointing hand shook in a very hysteria of hate.

"You dare call me a thief? You dare about the market like you can for your votes in the senate, the bribe you authorized to be given, the black mail you leveled for your influence in the legislature? Maybe you endured it, but I won't."

them legal fees? You a lawyer, when there isn't a business man in the country would trust you with a cent?"

Into Murchell's eyes had come a nearly gleam that in a saner moment would have restored Sherrod to self control, but now was unheeded. But his voice continued cold, cuttingly contemptuous.

"Thought you'd come into this affair and use the knowledge as a club to hull me out of politics with, didn't you? Well, swing your club. I'm not afraid. I know why you did it, not for me, but for yourself. You're trying to sneak back into the game after you've been thrown out, and you know that this thing if it came out would kill your chances as well as mine. It would help nobody but that fool Dan-meade, and by helping me you've made yourself an accessory. So then—crack your whip if you dare."

Murchell got slowly to his feet. He spoke still in the cold, even voice that ent.

"Just why I have done this isn't important at present. I had a good many reasons, some, probably, that you are not qualified to understand. And I'm not trying to sneak back into the game.
I've never been out of it. As to whether I want or dare to swing my club that remains to be seen. You'll have to chance it, Sherrod."

Sherrod laughed, a harsh, sneering exclamation that must have pierced into the adjoining room. "I'll change it! You're not the kind of man in whose hands such knowledge is dangerous. And I know all about your game. Do you think I've been fooled by your pretense? I know all about Wash Jenkins' campaign for delegates. I can be nominated governor even from behind the bars of the penitentiary."

Murchell was fully master of himself
once more. "That," he remarked,
"would be a fitting residence for you.
In the penitentiary, we'll put it out of your power to seek the nomination from that quarter."

He left the room abruptly, returning immediately with Watkins. He carefully closed the door behind them.
Then he faced the two men.

"Watkins, it's fortunate that you're cashier in the treasurer's office."

"Because from this minute I am state treasurer. Sherrod will be attached to sign vouchers that I approve.
That's all. You will report to me once a week in person. And not a voucher must be cashed until O. K'd by me. You understand?"

Watkins looked at Sherrod, then back to Murchell. He nodded.

"Sherrod will do nothing to disturb this arrangement. If he tries—let me know. Good day."

He went out of the room, quietly closing the door.

CHAPTER XVI.

A Deserted Jordan.

THE consternation in the royal palace was great when the beleaguered stronghold had fallen.
The Michigan had won into the Steel City.

Two men were scrambling over each other, tugging the state upside down, because each lust for power and hated the other. Victory by either, if one might judge by the past, meant corruption, thievery, oppression, injustice, and it would be won for him by characteristic means. The people knew it.

Between the two camps wandered a lonely voice, preaching honesty, decency, liberty, equity. He was worthy to preach. He was the sort of man to whom other men gladly entrusted their most important private affairs. He was fitted by capacity, by study, by ideals, for the preservation of government. He had put aside prefer-ent money, love, the love of reward, for any one of which men daily sacrifice their souls. That he might be the first to his task.

And as he went about that spring preaching his crusade, secretly and openly listened eagerly or with suspicion heard of many deceptions and systematic misdirections; let us be just indifferently responsive.

John was in the Steel City one night speaking at a public meeting. He was often laughed at for proffering old fashioned oratory in the day of the ubiquitous newspaper. But it was the only way in which he could reach the people, since the columns of the subsidized press were not open to him or his crusade. He went away from the hall heavily downcast. The audience had been small, anything but enthusiastic, and he had spoken poorly. There was no encouragement like that of the man who believes he has a message to give and knows that he has delivered it inadequately.

His way to the hotel took him along the city's principal street. He walked slowly, scrutinizing the passersby with that interest in city throngs which the country bred man never quite loses.

He came to a corner where another crowded thoroughfare crossed. He stopped and leaned against the wall of the bank that stood there.

The theaters were just letting out, and around him swirled a stream of humanity, the sound of many voices and twice as many feet rising in a peculiar, numismatic roar. John was dazed as the endless stream of humanity swept by him if it were true, as Hain had said to him once that 900 men in 1891 in the cities were dependent on the thousands, and that six men had it in their power to "turn on a pump" to "put on the screws."

What, if the screws were put on,
would these men do—fight or submit?

But it was not that which made the load of despondency hang heavier.

Once, seeing a thousand men gathered in the square at home, he had thought of the power there, "the power and the glory." Now he saw the people, not in their individuality, but in their infinitesimality; so many men

At least the Pittsburg Consumers' Co-operative association is investing in Michigan products.

M. J. Thompson, federal supervisor for ten of the Western Michigan counties is busy evolving a plan for growing of pedigreed seeds upon the county farms in his territory. He feels confident that the counties can do a good work by using part of the land in their farms for the purpose of improving the quality of seed used. Such of the counties as desire to take advantage of Mr. Thompson's plan will have their farms visited and schedules made that will fit their particular conditions.

DEATH OF PIONEER

Mrs. Margaret Whitley of This City Dies in Chicago January 22.

Mrs. Margaret Whitley, aged 74, an old resident of Charlevoix, died in Chicago, January 22, where she had gone on a visit to her daughter the first of the month.

Mrs. Whitley was one of the oldest residents of this city having come here with her husband in 1882, and with the exception of a few years spent on the farm, residing here since. She was the mother of a large family of which seven survive, two sons, James of Boyne City, Thomas of East Jordan and five daughters, Mrs. Livingston of Canada, Mrs. William Dougherty of Boyne City, Mrs. Koglin and Mrs. Paulson of Chicago and Mrs. John W. Kirby of this city.

The body was brought here for burial, the funeral being held from the Methodist church Saturday, Rev. Quinton Walker officiating.

Held Monthly Meeting.

The monthly meeting of the Civic League was held in council chamber Monday evening. The constitution was adopted, an executive committee was elected consisting of Dr. A. M. Wilkinson, James McGeagh and Rev. Mr. Taggart. The parties who investigated the present administration had only words of praise for it; after their report the league passed resolutions commending the mayor and pledged him their loyal support in his efforts to enforce the law.

COMPLETES FIRST YEAR'S WORK

Rev. B. Atchison of the Baptist Church Successful in His Work.

Given a Birthday Surprise Party Monday Night at Church Parlor.

Rev. B. Atchison was given a birthday surprise party at the church parlors Monday night, about fifty being present. After an impromptu program had been given Mr. Atchison was presented with a fine oak rocking chair.

A few weeks ago the members of the Marion charge presented Mr. Atchison with a parson of $20.

Mr. Atchison completed his first year's work as pastor of the Charlevoix church last Sunday, during which time all departments of church work have increased in membership and usefulness and such gatherings as these show that his efforts are appreciated.

"Great heavens, you are to fight the best swordsman and the best shot in the German army!"

The words were spoken by Madeline Crosby to Fred Barrington, both members of the American colony in Berlin.

"That being the case, I may as well bid you an eternal farewell," said the latter.

"You must apologize."

"Better die than live under the imputation of showing the white feather."

"Tell me how the trouble came about."

"I was dining at a cafe. A man in the uniform of a German officer sat at the next table. I was trying to give an order to the waiter and, I presume, got the wrong word for something I intended to express, for the officer smiled. I asked him what he was smiling at, whereupon he laughed. I must have blundered worse than before. I was angry, and, picking up part of a loaf of bread lying on the table, I threw it at him, striking him in the face and breaking his eyeglasses."

"Were there many in the cafe besides yourselves?"

"It was full. There were a number of army officers present."

"Then there is no hope for you. An insult to a German officer in the presence of his comrades can only be wiped out by an encounter. I know Captain von Ballenstein, having often met him at social functions. And I know his reputation as a shot and a swordsman. How could you have been so rash?"

"I would do it again under the same circumstances."

"Luckily you have but one life to lose. When does the meeting come off?"

"Not till the day after tomorrow. You see I need all the time I can get for practice, so I made an excuse to have the affair put off as long as possible. By the way, how did you hear of the affair?"

"At the reception last night at the palace. Several persons spoke of it."

"At home the police would be watching to prevent such a meeting."

"Here we are, watched to see that neither party shows the white feather."

"Well, goodbye. When we meet again I suppose it will be in heaven. I must go to my fencing master for practice."

"Practice! Little good practice will do you against Captain von Ballenstein. If he would only whig you it would be another matter. But he never permits his antagonist to get away in that fashion. When he fought his first duel he disarmed his antagonist. So great was his reputation that all the young bloods in the army were ambitious of the honor of having been with him and he was constantly provoked. Then he commenced to whig them. This not stopping the annoyance, he began to kill them. It is now understood that any one who insults Captain von Ballenstein will be killed."

"May I not call once more before I go?"

"No. I am too provoked with you."

She extended her hand. Barrington bent his head and pressed his lips upon it. Then for the first time a sad look appeared on his face, usually a stranger to care, and, turning, he left her.

Miss Crosby threw herself on to a sofa and covered her face with her hands. She loved this hot blooded South Carolinian, though as yet there had been no love-making between them. Indeed, this danger of losing him had revealed to her her true feelings toward him. She sat in deep thought, absorbed with the problem as to how she might prevent this sacrifice of one she loved without tarnishing his honor. She could gain access to the emperor, but at that time he had never interfered to prevent a duel, though she has done so in cases where there was no sufficient cause. No; there was no ordinary way to carry her point if she acted at all it must be by stratagem.

Presently she started up. A plan had suggested itself to her. Calling her butler, she said to him:

"Heinrich, I wish you to find me a loan broker or whatever those persons are called who have money to lend at high rates of interest and tell him to come to see me at once."

"Yes, fraulein." And the man with drew, wondering what his rich mistress could want of a loan broker. He returned with one Moses Weil, who asked the lady what he could do for her.

"Do you know Captain Herman von Ballenstein?"

"I know him well, fraulein."

"Quite likely. I have understood he is heavily in debt."

"Captain von Ballenstein does not at present owe me anything."

"But there are plenty of his due bills on the market, are there not?"

"They are perfectly good. His grandfather is very feeble and cannot live the year out. At his death the captain will come into the estate."

"How many of Von Ballenstein's due bills can you buy—I mean to what aggregate amount?"

"None at a discount."

"At a premium?"

"Whatever amount is desired."

"Very well. Go and buy as many as possible and report to me this evening what you have succeeded in doing."

Sitting down before a desk she wrote him a check for such funds as he would need for the purpose, though he protested that any funds in advance from her were not necessary. He left her, assuring her that he would have no difficulty in killing her order and the troubled look that had rested on her face partly disappeared.

The same evening the broker reported that he had purchased various due bills signed by Captain von Ballenstein to the amount of 50,000 marks, and returning her a balance of 10,000 marks loss his reputation, left her.

The next evening, notwithstanding that she had refused Barrington permission to see her again before his meeting with Captain von Ballenstein, he called, as she expected he would, for a final goodbye.

"You are beginning to realize your position, I perceive," she said, nothing a sadness resting on his features.

"There is an especial cause for regret," he replied.

"And that is?"

"I have been suddenly made aware at the approach of almost certain death that there is one I would not leave."

Miss Crosby cast down her eyes and waited. Barrington continued:

"Were it not for this prospect of being snuffed out I could not muster courage to tell an heiress that, were I permitted to live, my life would be worthless to me without her. Since I must die I feel privileged to do so, Madeline, I love you."

An hour later Barrington left Miss Crosby's residence, the sadness with which he had entered in one respect relieved, in another increased. He knew she loved him and, that there was little doubt that he would be killed in his coming encounter. His only hope was that his enemy would leave a little life in him and that he might recover.

The ground on which the affair was to take place was in a secluded spot near Berlin. Von Ballenstein arrived first and found a man waiting for him who stepped up to him and presented a bit of paper said:

"Herr Captain, I hold your note for 15,000 marks. Before you put your life in jeopardy I insist on payment."

The captain looked annoyed as he received the amount, and that he received for skill in such matters, and the likelihood that he would be even injured. But his creditor stood firm and, turning to a man whom he had brought with him, said:

"Herr Sheriff, you will make the arrest."

One of Von Ballenstein's seconds stepped up and, learning of the proposed arrest for debt, asked the amount of the bill. When it was given him he wrote an order on his bank for it. At the same time Barrington arrived, and the captain's party were about to measure off the ground when the creditor produced another due bill, this time for 20,000 marks. This amount was taken care of by another of Von Ballenstein's friends, but the obligations kept coming. They were all secured till 27,000 marks had been disposed of, when the funds of the party gave out. Three thousand marks remained to be paid.

Barrington had been a silent spectator of these proceedings up to this point, when he was confronted by the duel must be deferred till his adversary had returned to the city and arranged for the payment of the remaining three thousand marks.

"It would be a pity that Captain von Ballenstein should be deprived of the pleasure of killing me for the want of so small an amount. I have that much to a letter of credit which I will make over to this blood-sucker and we will proceed."

This was too much for Captain von Ballenstein. He not only withdrew his challenge, he said to Barrington, "but permit me to apologize for having laughed at your attempt to express yourself in my own language."

This he said, and then he turned to Barrington and said:

"Madeline Crosby, now Mrs. Barrington, was the secret of her strategy. Barrington's offer to go to security for his opponent's debt that the captain might be permitted to kill him was favorably commented on and the latter was excused by his fellow officers of the army for not making announcement of one with such thoroughbred instincts."

The Homesteader's Gamble is another big feature of this week's issue. It is by W. J. Harsha, a Colorado homesteader, and it tells the whole homesteading proposition from A to Z. Mr. Harsha has been through the mill and he says that a man who stakes a homestead and hasn't the two G's—gumption and grit—had better quit. He says further that a homesteader will stand a better chance of succeeding if he has $1000 in cash.

GOOD ROADS PROVERBS.

"If you want to know if good roads are a good thing, ask a horse."

Good roads promote prosperity; bad roads provoke profanity. If the roads around a town are bad it might as well be on an island.

In considering roads remember that there are few towns that look so good to the farmer that he will kill a horse to get there.

Ill fares the town to hastening illa prey where teams turn out to go some better way.

Was it in your township that the ignoramus pulled the sod into the middle of the road?

Good roads will increase health, happiness, education, religion and morality.

Good roads will decrease poverty, discourage, back taxes, shift sales, sour grapes and grouches.

HIS RISE TO POWER

ser to shake hands, for which John was thankful.

"How are you, Malley?"

"Mo?" Malley drew up a chair and deposited his huge bulk in it. "Oh, I'm livin' on No. 1 Easy street. These here is good times for fellers like me. With an apparently unconscious gesture he lovingly stroked his stomach.

"So I should say. Same old profession?"

"I got a half interest in a booze joint. That's my business. As for professin', I'm still a statesman. Only yuh had a fine time gittin' the goods on me now. I learnt," he grinned, "a lot from yuh. Say, I'm wantin' smokin'."

"What can I do for you?"

"Tuh! for me?" He assumed an air of extreme caution. "Spesh'ly, I wuz a feller who never done yuh no dirt and at the same time, not bein' in yer game, yuh got him good. An' then 'posin' he beat it, not wantin' to serve me, an' then, bein' up against it in a peckin' way, he wanted to see yuh. Would yuh see him?"

"Slattery or Sheehan?"

"Sheehan."

"I guess I'd see him. Where is he?"

Malley winked solemnly. "I don't know nuthin' till I know yuh won't have him pinched. That's the point—will yuh have him pinched?"

John thought a moment before replying. "Well, I guess I wouldn't so long as he stays out of my jurisdiction. I couldn't make him more harmless now by havin' him arrested."

"Then go in the little room back of the bar, an' I'll have him with yuh in no time. He's waitin' not far away."

In a few minutes Malley returned, leading the fugitive. There was an embarrassing moment as John rose to greet the man whom he had broken. He hesitated, hardly knowing how to address him. Sheehan's hand started forward in an uncertain gesture, then dropped back to his side. Then kindly inquisitive John held out his. The other caught it almost eagerly in a soft, damp clasp.

"I hope you are well, Sheehan."

"I look it, don't I?" The fugitive gave a half hearted laugh.

John was obliged to confess to himself that he did not look it. His cheeks, once so ruddy, were sallow and dimpled. Flabby pouches had gathered under his eyes, which were furiously restless, as though continually on the watch for some answer. He was fatter than ever, but whereas his stomach had formerly been of the graceful roundness of semi-active prosperity, it had now become a pouch like unto Malley's own.

"Sit down," said Malley hospitably, "an' have a drink on me."

John sat down but declined the drink. Sheehan and Malley ordered whiskey. The drink seemed to restore to Sheehan a part of his nerve. Without further preliminaries he blurted out, "I want to go back."

John waved his hand and remarked, "The railroads are still running," a pleasantry that seemed lost on Sheehan.

"It's that cursed sentence that's troublin' me."

"That's nuthin'," Malley interposed cheerfully. "It's only four months in the workhouse. I got a year in the pen." His tone might have led one to believe him boasting of a distinction.

"I should think," said John gravely, "you would find it almost a relief to have it served and over."

"So I would," answered Sheehan, with an emphatic shrug that was not to be doubted. "But I've got a family."

"A little too much of them, isn't it?"

"I wouldn't if you said the word."

John shook his head. "Feshies, I'll not be shakin' money much longer, and my successor, if I don't, he can't."

Sheehan leaned over the table and chuckled. "I guess you haven't got any more?"

"I've got a wife and two kids that I think as much of as if I was an educated reformer. I haven't seen them in nearly five years, for fear you would trail me through them. But now they are in trouble. Money affairs are all hopped up. And the wife's got to go under my question. I don't know whether she'll pull through or not. I ought to be there to take care of them."

A doubtful blessing to them, John thought, studying the dissipation and red countenance. Still he was not there to pass on Sheehan's value to the family. And he remembered having heard that in former days Sheehan had been very good and fond of his wife and children and so forth. At the moment his kind-heartedness to them didn't think you'd let me off.

lived. He met the trio, the night before the primaries, at Cranshaw's home on the pike. They did not pretend a value on him; they knew that they faced defeat.

"At any rate," remarked Cranshaw, at the close of the discussion, "you've got six years of good fighting."

"I guess," said Cranshaw, kindly, "you think it hasn't paid. In one way, maybe it hasn't. An' then again, maybe it has. It's like what I once told you. You've showed up the wad. If we hadn't followed, it's our own lookout. You've done your part."

"You have," agreed Sykes solemnly.

And when he left all three made a point of shaking hands with him.

THE HORSEMAN.

Horses with tender feet need lots of attention.

Demand for good draft horses greatly on the increase.

He that abuses his colts may expect to be kicked by his horses.

Jerking the bit and yelling commands to a horse and advertise a blackhead.

You can get no more power from your horse than you give him in his feed.

Your horse may intend to please you, but does not understand your wishes.

It should be remembered that a horse cannot do more than his feet will stand.

SHEEP MANAGEMENT.

Secure Uniformity of Type by Sticking to One Breed.

To the man that now has sheep of mixed breeding or to the beginner we would say endeavor to have uniformity of type. It is not necessary to have a registered flock in order to have a successful one. In fact, but a very small percentage of the sheep in this country are registered, says American Cultivator.

The first idea should be to determine upon the type of sheep you wish to breed and in determining this take into consideration the general environment and market demands. Then select a pure bred ram of the type you desire and grade up the flock, always taking pains to keep a pure bred at the same head at the head. It seems a little expensive at times to do this, but the advantage of having better lambs and a uniform flock more than offsets the difference. For the beginner it is better to go slowly and gain experience as you go than to start too large and make a failure. It may be better to start with ewes that have lambed before, as less difficulty will be experienced.

The ewe flock should be carefully culled each year and any ewe that is a shy breeder, or a feeder, that has a bad udder or broken mouth, should be discarded. Ewes in this class are not profit bearers and will bring greater returns at this time than any other.

The usual breeding season for ewes is from the 1st of September until the end of the year, the gestation period being about 140 to 150 days. If the ewes are in rather poor condition at the time they are mated, the lambs will be small and weak. It is better to allow the ewes to run with a large flock and no attention is paid to the breeding. It will result in a long lambing season and frequently part of the ewes getting by without setting. A little attention, however, on the part of the owner will prevent this difficulty. Where a large flock is to be bred by one man, if he is allowed with the flock one hour or so each morning and evening and is fed additional oats, a hand full of linseed and some succulent feed, the results will be far more satisfactory. The ewes also should be in the best condition. The English flock master plans to have a field of rape or clover to turn his ewes into at this season or else puts them on a grain ration.

The Sweat Pad.

When considering the sweat pad the felt inside that we sometimes put in our shoes comes to my mind, writes a correspondent of National Stockman. We should the insides all right in winter, when it is cold, but when the weather warms up and we begin to perspire we find them hot and extremely filthy, conducive to sore feet, and we discard them in disgust. I wonder if the horse could talk whether he wouldn't express his disgust also of the soggy, damp, filthy bearing, sore-producing sweat pad. For winter work the sweat pad may be as comfortable for the horse as the insides for the man, but in winter the horses are plump and the hair thick, so the collars fit and we don't use the sweat pads. It's in the summer, when the horse gets thin and the collar loose, that the disgusting sweat pad finds itself in use, and the result is sore necks every time. A perfectly fitting collar never causes a sore neck. Collars should be bought or fitted in the winter when the horse is hard at work. Collars should not be switched from day to day from one horse to another.

Found.

Come to my premises two years ago. I have a fine lot of cattle, one black, one red. Owner please call and pay charges. D. E. Ingalls—Advertisement, 4513.

There Was an Embarrassing Moment.

the workhouse. I got a year in the pen." His tone might have led one to believe him boasting of a distinction.

"I should think," said John gravely, "you would find it almost a relief to have it served and over."

"So I would," answered Sheehan, with an emphatic shrug that was not to be doubted. "But I've got a family."

"A little too much of them, isn't it?"

"I wouldn't if you said the word."

John shook his head. "Feshies, I'll not be shakin' money much longer, and my successor, if I don't, he can't."

Sheehan leaned over the table and chuckled. "I guess you haven't got any more?"

"I've got a wife and two kids that I think as much of as if I was an educated reformer. I haven't seen them in nearly five years, for fear you would trail me through them. But now they are in trouble. Money affairs are all hopped up. And the wife's got to go under my question. I don't know whether she'll pull through or not. I ought to be there to take care of them."

A doubtful blessing to them, John thought, studying the dissipation and red countenance. Still he was not there to pass on Sheehan's value to the family. And he remembered having heard that in former days Sheehan had been very good and fond of his wife and children and so forth. At the moment his kind-heartedness to them didn't think you'd let me off.

"I didn't think you'd let me off."

"I didn't think you'd let me off."

Lecturer's hour was taken up with the following program: Music, Orlic Hooper.

Some of the things our grandmothers did that the women of today do not do, responded to by Mrs. Atwood, Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Shelton.

What is meant by the Referendum, Recall and Initiative, answered by Mrs. Nellie Tillotson.

Song by Ethel Zipp and Marion Worth.

Recitation by Bessie Tillotson.

Music by Theo Bowman.

43 members were present and nine visiting members from Maple Grove grange, and one from Ironton grange.

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting.

Next meeting will be held February 14th. All members requested to be present.

Harmony Grange

Harmony grange held open grange on Thursday evening, January 23, for the purpose of installing officers. Brother William Mears of Boyne River grange acted as installing officer assisted by Brother Willard Warden. Several of the officers-elect were absent, some unexpectedly moved away. However, the installation ceremony passed off smoothly and was followed by short talks by Worthy Master J. A. Newville, Brother Mears and Brother Marvin of Holton, Michigan, who has been doing institute work in this county, all of which was followed by a fine supper.

A proposition was laid before the grange to be voted on at the next meeting to change the night of meeting from the second and fourth Tuesday evenings in the month to the second and fourth Thursdays. Vacant offices will be filled at the next meeting and the lecturer announced the program for next meeting to include quotations from Will Carleton, music, a discussion "What is the modern farmer's greatest need?" to be led by Brother H. L. Willson and other members.

Saturday Special: Chocolate decorated 25c per pound at Bert Beaudoin's.—Adv.

Wilson Grange

The regular meeting of Wilson grange occurred Saturday, January 25.

There were thirty-two members present and one visitor from Deer Lake grange.

Worthy Master Robert Shepard appointed the following committees:

Finance—E. S. Brintnall, George Jaquays, Lura Hindkins.

Executive—Thomas Shepard, Jasper Warden, Fred Holland.

Dance—Arthur Brintnall, Frank Smith.

Surprise—All young people of grange.

The secretary read a communication from the secretary of Pomona announcing the next meeting with Maple Grove grange February 20.

The business agent gave a report of the business carried on during preceding year.

An announcement was made regarding the rural carriers convention and picnic dinner at the Ohio Fellows hall, Boyne City, February 22.

After an interesting program grange closed to meet in two weeks.

Peninsula Grange

Peninsula grange met in regular session January 21.

Regular order of business was disposed of. Owing to the death of the secretary's mother, the secretary, Mrs. Fred Heller, was unable to be present and installation of officers was postponed until the next meeting, February 5. The literary program and discussion were much enjoyed.

There will be a party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Rubling January 30. Come and stay all day. Come to all the meetings.

Charlevoix Grange

Charlevoix grange met in regular session Monday night with an attendance of 14.

Lecturer's program consisted of an interesting talk on a visit to the Saginaw Manual Training school by E. B. Ward and recitation by Ursula Crawford.

The program announced for this meeting will be given at the next meeting.

THE FLOCK MASTER.

If you are a beginner with sheep go slow until you have mastered the industry. As in poultrying or any other like business, experience is the safe, sure teacher.

Among the essentials of the successful care and management of a farm flock of mutton sheep is that we treat them in a manner adapted to their nature.

There are usually some ewes that have served their days of usefulness and better be discarded.

To have good size sheep they must be grown rapidly while young, and it is important to give them a good start.

The ideal sheep pasture is blue grass and white clover. It makes the driest, closest sod, and dry land is best for sheep.

Plan for a big lot of roots for the sheep this year.

With turnips, sugar beets and clover or alfalfa hay, it will be easy to make the flock pay a handsome profit.

THE DRAFT STALLION.

Work the Only Test of Strength and Staying Qualities.

There is no good reason why a draft stallion should not work, and there are a good many reasons why he should work, said J. G. Arbutnot in the report of the Kansas live stock registry board.

Any man who is a horseman in the true sense of the word can work one or even two stallions. I have two Percheron stallions that worked together last summer, and neither was broken to harness until the preceding spring. We hitched them when one had been worked three times and the other five or six times. After they had been worked together a few times one man handled them alone. We kept a jockey stick on them when hitched and taught them that when they had the harness and blind bridles on there was to be no fooling. Many a time we hitched them from the manure spreader and took them into the barn, unharnessed them and changed their bridles to try mares and then put them right back into harness.

Work is the only proof of the strength and staying qualities of a work horse. I have known draft stallions to do a good business when they were so un sound that if castrated and tried on a horse buyer would not make a bid on them. As stallions they could do a good many people.

The American trotter has won the admiration of the world on account of his speed and endurance as exhibited in many hard fought battles on the track. Such endurance and speed would not have been possible except for the stamina bequeathed by ancestors who stood on the merits of their records and the records of their ancestors. In fact, the achievements of the American trotter and pacer are simply "the survival of the fittest," while the achievements of the American drafter are too often the survival of the fat test. An animal kept in idleness can not be expected to possess any great amount of strength and endurance, and one of the strongest laws of breeding is "like begets like." A horse can not transmit good qualities which he does not himself possess. In fact, not all horses can beget with any certainty the good qualities which they do possess.

If the only use of the draft horse was the butcher's block, the same as the fat steer and the fat hog, then no work would be necessary to produce the greatest amount of soft, fat flesh but when we consider the heavy loads that are to be drawn by the offspring of our draft stallions we should choose a stallion that has size combined with action, strength and endurance. There is no way to tell whether a horse possesses these qualities except by putting him to the test.

Carried Too Far.

He had no invariable way of asking the wrong question or making the wrong comment. So it was when at a dinner party his neighbor, a lady, said to him: "I am a thorough believer, you know, Mr. Smith, that men's clothes should match their hair. A black haired man should wear black clothes, a brown haired man should wear brown clothes. Don't you think so?"

"That may be," bumbled Smith, "but suppose a man is bald?"—Ladies Home Journal.

QUESTION NOW BEING STUDIED

Interesting Series of Articles on Commission Form of Government.

ADVANTAGES ARE EXPLAINED

Plan Meeting With Large Amount of Public Favor and Support.

Whenever it Has Been Submitted to the People Experience of City of Des Moines Given as an Example.

Below we print the first of an interesting series of articles on the commission form of government by E. J. Millington of Cadillac from the news of that city.

Among the various propositions which are being advanced in connection with the ever present question of municipal government, the proposal to establish what is known as the commission form of government is receiving a large amount of attention. Some discussion of it at this time is timely because it is being seriously proposed to submit this form of government to the people of our city for adoption. It may be said at the outset that the commission form of government, like every other form of government which has ever been adopted or proposed, has certain distinct and unquestionable merits, and certain other equally distinct and unquestionable demerits. It neither justifies the extravagant laudations of its friends, nor the equally extravagant condemnations of its enemies. In the hands of good men, it will work well; in the hands of bad men, it will work ill. Whatever may be the final determination as to its intrinsic merits, it will still remain true that in all questions of government the human equation is the one supremely important thing to which all questions of form and method must be forever subordinate.

It is undeniable that the commission form of government has met with a rather unusually large amount of public favor and support. It was first adopted in the city of Galveston, Texas, in 1901, for the purpose of meeting the critical situation of affairs which existed in that city at that time. Since then the general plan adopted there has met with such favor that it has been adopted in every city of any size in the state of Texas; in three-fourths of the cities in Iowa; in 90 per cent of the cities in Kansas; and in all in about two hundred cities in the entire country. Out of all the cities in which the question of its adoption has been submitted to the people, it has been rejected in only about two per cent. It is very evident, therefore, that it is something more than a fad. It is rather a movement which deserves and must receive serious consideration.

The government of the city of Des Moines, Iowa, affords a typical illustration of the commission form of government. Des Moines is a city of about ninety thousand population and it adopted the commission plan in 1907. All the business of the city is divided among five departments, viz: the department of streets and public improvements; the department of public safety; the department of accounts and finances; the department of parks and public buildings; and the department of public affairs, which acts in an advisory and supervisory capacity. They elect a man as the head of each department—elections being held every two years. Any number of citizens can be candidates for nomination at the primaries—the only requisite being that in order to be entitled to a place on the ballot the candidate's petition must be signed by twenty-five voters. The ten candidates receiving the highest number of votes in the primaries are nominated, and of these, five are chosen at the election. The election ballot is what is commonly known as the short ballot, containing only the names of the ten nominees, alphabetically arranged, and with no party designation of any kind. These five men, after election, not only act as heads of their various departments, but they also form a body which

DEATH OF FORMER RESIDENT

Flavius J. Smith Dies Suddenly in Grand Rapids—Was Civil War Veteran.

Flavius J. Smith, brother of Tim Smith and Mrs. Bennett of this city, a former resident of Hayes township, died at Grand Rapids January 25.

Mr. Smith was born in New York September 5, 1834. November 11, 1850 he was united in marriage to Elvira Johnson. To this union was given eight children, six of whom are living. He heard his country's call and enlisted in Co. G, 3rd Michigan Infantry, serving three years. The funeral was held from the home of his sister, Mrs. Bennett, on State street last Friday. Rev. Quinton Walker officiating.

WORK CUT-OVER TIMBER LAND

Present Legislature May Authorize Counties to Issue Bonds.

Plan is to Use Short Term Prisoners for Clearing Up the Land.

Two ways of carrying out Governor Ferris' suggestion for improving the cut-over timber lands of Michigan, will be presented to the legislature within the next few weeks. One is to permit the counties to bond themselves to pay for the clearing and stumpage and to raise money off the bonds by a tax on the improved lands, as is now done in the drainage districts.

The other proposition is to have the work done by establishing camps of short term prisoners similar to the prospecting camps that are conducted with the convicts in Colorado.

It is pointed out that northern Michigan especially has towns and railroad facilities built upon disappearing lumber interests which are leaving them without adequate agricultural development.

As the case now stands, the resolute hustling farmer cannot afford to settle on these lands in Michigan when the opportunity of government aid over in Canada is before him. The result is that our settlers are mostly foreigners who have not the means or ability to meet the situation in a competent manner.

If a man who bought an eighty acre tract, he could begin farming and getting his return right off. The bonds would be made for a long term so that the assessments against the land would not be a burden to him. In this way the much needed farming industry could be built up rapidly without appreciable cost to anyone.

The other plan, it is argued, will be a by-product, be an acceptable solution of the problem confronting many counties as to what to do with the ninety days' and six months' prisoners. This arrangement would give them healthy, useful, outdoor employment.

State Teachers' Institute

The department has appointed Prof. S. B. Laird of Ypsilanti and Dr. Fess of Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, to conduct an institute for the teachers of Charlevoix county on February 10-11 at Charlevoix.

Dr. Fess will use the following topics: A Method in History; Thomas Jefferson and Liberty in Government; A Hamilton and Power in Government.

Prof. Laird will use such of the following topics as time will permit: The Child—Considered Mentally, Physiologically, Morally, Correct Discipline, Educational Waste, Arrested Development, Grammar Grade Reading, Some Laws of Teaching.

This meeting will surely be a valuable one and every teacher in the county is urged to attend.

The sessions will be held in the High school building and will begin promptly at 10:00 a. m.

PREPARATION OF SCHOOL EXHIBITS WELL UNDER WAY

Dedication of Educational and Fine Arts Building Will be Big Feature of County Fair of 1913—Governor Ferris and Other Prominent Men Will Attend—Pupils and Teachers Are Hard at Work.

Every year the annual county fair has been an improvement over the previous fair and 1912 proved no exception. However, in one particular the fair has been lacking proper educational exhibits. This year's fair will be different for the plans are fully matured for the erection of an educational building where the work of our schools can be properly shown.

At the September meeting of the directors of the Charlevoix County Agricultural society $100 was appropriated to be divided equally between the city and country schools of the county, to be paid in premiums as the committee may determine, and this will be supplemented by special premiums for work in agriculture and horticulture by the pupils of our public schools. The committee in charge consists of Superintendents of Schools De Voe of this city, Butler of Boyne City and Norton of East Jordan.

ARE STUDYING AGRICULTURE

Every Rural Eighth Grade in Michigan Now Busy in the Work.

Became Part of Prescribed Course of Study in Public Schools This Year.

Beginning with the current month every rural eighth grader in Michigan is studying agriculture. This important subject became a part of the prescribed course of study this year and examinations in it will be conducted in May along with the other subjects. Textbooks have been provided and in addition to these the Department of Public Instruction has available for distribution an excellent bulletin concerning the subject prepared by Prof. W. H. French of the M. A. C. The Michigan Agricultural College and the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C. stand ready to send to teachers invaluable aids for the teaching of this new subject. Naturally the work finds the teacher unprepared but progressive farmers throughout the state are showing a disposition to make this work efficient so that it may be expected that even the first experimental year will be productive of good.

The introduction of agriculture into the course of study by Superintendent of Public Instruction Luther L. Wright is the first step toward ruralizing the county schools. In order to make the work thoroughly successful certain equipment seems essential. So earnest is Mr. Wright in his feeling that agriculture should be the most live subject in the country school that he makes the statement that if a board from a question of expense really had to make a choice between a dictionary and a Babcock tester, they ought to purchase a milk tester. As this important piece of farm equipment, however, costs not more than ten dollars there is little reason why every school district should not have one.

The corn clubs which have been organized in various parts of the state have been a decided aid already to the study of agriculture and the intense interest of the boys and girls in these clubs and what they have produced show that the added subject to the rural school curriculum is not unwelcome so far as the students are concerned. Co-operation of parents and progressive farmers will do a great deal toward making this work effective.

HOW RURAL Y. M. C. A. HELPS

Secretary Ball Explains How it Supplements Work of the Home.

Of Great Benefit to Boys When Leaving Home for College or Work.

The primary agencies for development in any community are the home, the church and the school. To these three agencies are entrusted the training of the young citizen, and the Y. M. C. A., no matter how efficient its work, cannot take the place of any one of these established institutions but it can and does supplement the work of all three.

It supplements the work of the home in a variety of ways depending entirely on just where the home fails to function properly. Where the home is lax in teaching of spiritual things the association attempts to interest the boys of that home in some branch of Bible study and then in applying the truths to conditions as they find them in life. Rather than dwell to long upon the things they cannot do we prefer to emphasize the things they can do that will make life better and create in the boys a keen desire to do those very things. If the father, because of long working hours imposed on him because of a maladjustment of industry or because of long working hours self imposed owing to an overmastering desire to see certain things come to pass, fails to be a chum to his boys we try to do the "chumming" that the father should do and realize that we are far from filling the need. Knowing that the majority of homes fail entirely to teach anything regarding sex hygiene we arrange to secure the services of experts who can do this satisfactorily. Often failures on the part of parents to fully understand their boys or on the part of boys to understand their parents have been adjusted by secretaries of the association and the disastrous results of broken homes averted.

Realizing the importance of education not because it increases a boy's power to earn but because it increases his power to serve we aim to co-operate with the school in stimulating the interest of the boys in things educational. Not only do we aim to assist the boy while he is attending high school in the county but we follow him as he leaves for college and attempt to link him up with the association in the college where he can get assistance in finding suitable rooming quarters and a satisfactory board. Often times the association is able to secure work at the college for boys and thus assist them in defraying a part of their college expenses. It is very seldom that a boy leaves one

TO SELL STATE TUG

Gas Launch to Replace the Game Warden's Tug—Chase S. Osborn.

The game warden's department is contemplating releasing from service the flag ship of its fleet, the tug Chase S. Osborn. After ploughing the waves of the great lakes for the past three years and bringing fear, trouble, anger and tribulation to the outlaw fishermen, the gallant craft may be sold and will end her days carrying summer girls to and from summer resorts. The proceeds will go toward the purchase of a couple of big gasoline launchers. The Osborn, purchased three years ago by Game Warden Pierce for about $4,000, is 82 feet long and has 12 foot beam.

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE REPORTS

In Regard to Desirable Liquor Traffic Legislation Needed in State.

Interesting Meeting of Men's Bible Class Sunday—Professor Laird Next Sunday.

Mr. W. J. Rachow addressed the Men's Bible class last Sunday on the subject of the "Blue Sky law, and other kindred financial topics." The address was a masterly presentation of the intent and purpose of the Blue Sky law. Mr. Rachow also treated other kindred topics in a manner which held the attention of his listeners unabated to the end of his address. It would be useless to attempt a review of what he said or present an abstract of it. It would require the reproduction of the address entire to do it justice. Those who were there felt well repaid for the effort required to bring them there and those who were not missed the opportunity to gain information and suggestion which will be of practical use and inestimable value to every person.

Next Sunday it is expected that Professor Laird of the Ypsilanti Normal College will address the class. Professor Laird is a strong man intellectually and the message he will bring will no doubt be up lifting and inspiring.

At the business session of the Men's class the legislative committee which had heretofore been appointed, made the following report and by vote the committee were asked to secure its publication in the local papers. The report is as follows:

To the Charlevoix Men's Bible Class: Gentlemen: Your legislative committee respectfully submits the following report. At a meeting of said committee recently held, various matters of legislation now pending and others deemed fitting by your committee as coming within the purview of an organization of this sort were discussed. Chief among these were questions affecting the liquor

ANOTHER PIONEER GONE

Alfred W. Lynde Dies of His Home in This City Thursday.

Alfred W. Lynde, a resident of this city, died at his home last Thursday.

Mr. Lynde was born in Canada, March 31, 1843, and came to this country thirty-two years ago, settling on a farm south of the city, where he resided until four years ago when on account of impaired health he removed to this city, but all that kind care and medical skill could do was of no avail.

Mr. Lynde was married to Miss Nettie Johnson, March 28, 1880, who with nine brothers and three sisters are left to mourn his loss.

The funeral services were conducted from the home Saturday afternoon, the family pastor, Rev. Quinton Walker, officiating.

Mr. Lynde was most highly respected and greatly loved by those who knew him best.

EARL H. CLARK NEW PRESIDENT

Of Charlevoix County Farmers' Institute Society—A Wise Choice.

SEC'Y NEWVILLE RE-ELECTED

Institute Held Last Week Was Full of Interest and Value.

Deplorable Lack of Interest by Residents of This City in the Work of the Society—Other Institute Notes.

The round-up farmers' institute, held in this city Wednesday and Thursday of last week was well attended by the farmers from the surrounding country but the attendance of townspeople was lacking.

Promptly on time Wednesday morning the meeting was called to order by President Mearns, who introduced the conductor, O. F. Marvin of Holton. Mr. Marvin impressed the audience at once as a practical farmer, who would speak from first hand knowledge and not from hearsay. Mr. Marvin took up the important subject of tillage and crop rotation which called out an animated discussion.

The next speaker, Rev. A. Bentall of Northport, gave a very interesting talk on small fruit culture. After dinner Mr. Marvin took up the subject of corn and corn silage, the main features which were brought out, both in the talk and the discussion which followed, being that in this section, care should be taken not to plant the large varieties. Mr. Bentall next took up the care of the orchard. This was one of the most interesting talks given during the institute. Mr. Bentall's advice was to only set trees of such varieties as you could grow better than anyone else and not plant those which would be grown in other sections as well as here. Earl Clark, in opening the discussion, devoted his attention to the new Sulzer law and the marketing problem.

The evening session was quite well attended the subjects given in the program being handled in an interesting manner.

Thursday's sessions were full of interest. Mr. Carpenter of the public schools gave a demonstration of the Babcock tester. A surprise was given when milk purchased in the open Charlevoix market at Beaudoin's showed a test of six per cent. The Women's Congress at the Methodist church was well attended. Miss Jennie Buell giving a fine talk on open windows, and Mrs. Adelia Porter giving an interesting talk on old pioneer days. The County Normal class also furnished several interesting and pleasing numbers in the program.

Election of officers resulted in the choice of Earl H. Clark for president and the re-election of Secretary Newville. A vice-president was also chosen from each township. The new president, Mr. Clark, is one of the most enterprising young farmers in the county, paying particular attention to fruit growing and the society is bound to thrive under his aggressive leadership.

As we stated at the outset the attendance from the city was a disappointment and to the discredit of the city, it must be said that enough of Charlevoix's business men failed to show their appreciation of the work of the state in sending the institute here to pay their membership dues of twenty-five cents to pay the expenses of the meeting. If any feel that they would like to help out, the Courier is authorized to receive your dues. All members will receive all the publications of the experiment station. We hope to receive enough to at least pay the expenses of the institute.

Pleasant Evening Party.

Monday night about fifty-two friends and neighbors of Mrs. William Hugman gathered at her home on May street. Refreshments were served by Mrs. Charles Jeffries, Mrs. Dan Swartz, Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Thompson. A very enjoyable time was the verdict of all in attendance.

HIS RISE TO POWER

CHAPTER XVII Shadows.

The bank behind closed blinds, Warren Blake was working at his desk. He had been coming out of the bank every night for weeks. It did not cause comment. It was like Warren Blake, people thought, to be working early and late. No one who had not the key would have detected in the widened eyes and imperceptibly twitching nostrils a hint of the mickling anxiety within. His pallor would have been attributed to the garish gaslight overhead. Quite deliberately he added up the column of figures before him. They spelled his crime.

Very cleverly, very characteristically, he had gone about it. Humphden he knew, caught in the big deal into which Warren had followed him, had drifted into it—had hardly realized, as in the heat of necessity he asked the cashier to certify checks for what there were no funds, that it was a crime. Not so with Warren. In cold blood, with a nice calculation of the chances, he had stepped over the line that he had never before crossed. Once over, he had gone far. It had been a gambler's chance, the card that many men take safely, and, when taken, had seemed all in his favor. But now the luck was running the other way. If the market sagged further, he would be done for.

No one, if told, would have believed why he had done it—because the bank was breaking anyhow under the load of worthless paper, most of it a legacy from his predecessor, and, with a great deal of money, could save it. It had been his pride to carry about an institution for the shakiness of which he was not responsible. It had become his life. He had risked all, even his own little carefully accumulated fortune, to save all, though he had made it a point of honor not to risk the trust properties in his keeping—he somehow made a distinction.

If the market should sag, how should he pay? Humphden, though bankrupt, would be able to work out of the hole. He could always get money somewhere. But Humphden could not, hence, would not, try to save both. How then should he, Warren Blake pay? With shame, certainly. With money—out of the question.

If the market should sag! Suddenly came to him the sure foreknowledge that it would sag. For an instant panic filled him. He put the books in their places, then began fumbling around a dusty shelf in a dark corner of the vault—until his fingers found and drew forth an oblong pasteboard box. He opened it and looked at what lay within. He took it out and played with it. The gleaming, blue book, thing seemed to hold a horrible fascination for him. It cost him an effort to put it away. He set the time lock, closed the vault and left.

John Dunmado, having reached home, put his horse away in the stable. It was past 11 o'clock and he was tired. But he was not sleepy and he hated to go to bed in the clear, still night. So he strolled uptown, in a mood to have a pipe with Hale before going to bed. His way took him past the bank just as Warren stepped out. The latter stopped.

"Working late, aren't you?" said John.

"I often do." He hesitated. "Are you out for a walk?"

"Down to Hale's. Will you go along?" John asked politely.

"A part of the way, if you don't mind. Sometimes, when I've been working hard, I like to talk to some one to forget myself. How are the primaries going?"

"The primaries? Bad. In fact, they couldn't be worse."

"I thought as much. I'm sorry. I'd like to see you win."

John was thoroughly surprised. "I supposed you were against me."

"I've always voted for you. You are fitted for public service. You have something apart from mere intellect and ability, and, far rarer, the capacity to feel what we all accept in theory but not in fact—your relation to other men. I wish I could feel—could have felt it. Whatever gave you that sixth sense won't let you quit. It will carry you to the end—through weakness and strength."

Something in the man's voice rather than in what he said arrested John's interest. "Do you really think that, Warren?"

"There are things that one knows."

They halted, having reached the home of Silas Hicks, where Hale had his rooms. The clear Warren had been smoking had come out. He struck a match to relight it. He held the flaring taper before him for an instant longer than was necessary and John could see his face. It was composed but pale, the eyes extraordinarily bright.

"Primary day?"

From one end of the state to the other the battle raged between red rose and white. When darkness put an end to the sanguinary conflict both sides were clanking and neither side had the victory. The issue must be removed for decision to the convention.

Benlon county, a Murdell stronghold, chose its complement of delegates instructed for the Hon. G. Washburn Jenkins. Also it gave, as it thought, John Dunmado his quarters.

Senator Murdell and his guest, Jenkins, received the returns at the former's home. Jeremy Applegate, too, was there, not overburdened as he should have been by the honor, to tabulate reports. Other politicians, the crowd dropped in. Once, at midnight, Jeremy answered a ring at the desk telephone, listened to the message and hung up the receiver without saying a word.

"What is it?" asked some one.

"John Dunmado's beaten," Jeremy answered shortly.

Murdell looked at the clerk.

"Don't seem overjoyed, Jeremy?"

Jeremy pushed back his chair and got to his feet. He faced Murdell.

"I was thinking," he said unobtrusively, "I was thinking, it's a shame."

The old body and the cracked, shrill voice shook with passion. "If you want to know, I voted for him. It's the only man's job I ever done since I came to be your leader. You've beaten an honest man, the best man this county ever had, and—now you can have me kicked out of my job if you like."

The politicians were too amazed at this unbelievable instance of loss of self-control to laugh. Upon mumbled they watched him as, quivering with defiance and the hate of the oppressed, he glared at Murdell much as in a former time he must have confronted the gray charge. They expected nothing less than that the lightnings would blust Jeremy where he stood; hence

"If you want to know, I voted for him."

Intensified stupefaction when Murdell said gravely, "Jeremy, you'd better go home. We'll talk about your job another time."

The old clerk, turned and slowly stamped out of the room.

"Jeremy," commented the senator, "seems to have muddled an unspectacular backslide."

The politicians, uncertain whether this was senatorial humor or not, chose silence as the course of discretion.

Later still, after the small fry had left, came the news that the opposition had freed itself and that Jerry Dunmado would control his convention, which meant that he would be nominated for governor. And this was matter for grave concern. Until nearly morning the leaders discussed candidates. The tenor of their conversation seemed to indicate that Wash Jenkins was not assured of the Murdell support. Nor did he seem unduly resentful because of this fact. Wash was a model retainer, humbly willing to take what he could get.

It was in the course of this discussion that Senator Murdell said, "If John Dunmado weren't such a stubborn fellow he would be just the man to meet Trent with." He spoke angrily.

The others gave respectful if surprised assent.

In the financial district of the Steel City it was no June day relaxation. In the exchange was a howling, frenzied mob struggling desperately to speculate advancing fortune or to retain that which was vanishing in the Alabama Iron and Coal squeeze.

A glutted by methods that would have done credit to the robber barons had raged the treasure developed by weaker brethren. And now greedy, more gluttonous, springing upon him in an unguarded moment, by like methods were tearing the spoils from his grasp. But no one saw a joke before it could end two great banking houses would be bankrupt, at least one daring, arrogant speculative sensation ally ruined and a thousand little greedy ones made penniless.

The mad scramble rose to a climax. In his office the man who was the storm center stood over the ticker. He had struggled with the unthinking, valor born of desperation, against the unceasing, relentless attacks made upon him. They had forced him back further and still further back to his inner lines of defense, into the last ditch. Driven out of that he had made a last vain stand. Now he awaited the slaughter. He glared at the time in his hand.

Suddenly the sixty broke up in an insane helpless rage that demanded physical expression. From his twisted mouth came an inarticulate, wailing cry. With a convulsive jerk he snatched off the tape-kicked the ticker until it fell with a crash. A clerk in the outer office heard the noise and rushed in. Immediately, frightened by what he saw, he withdrew, closing the door behind him.

Stephen Humphden was not good to look upon as he rushed up and down the room, striking and kicking at the objects in his way. His face was purple-convulsed. He poured out maddening impressions on the "cens," the "cens," the "cens" who had broken him. He had no thought for those upon whom he in his turn had fallen. He was obsessed by the passion of his defeat.

The paroxysm spent itself. He flung himself, panting and still glaring, into a chair. The telephone rang. He paid no attention to it.

The clerk, trembling, opened the door. "You're wanted on the long distance, Mr. Humphden. It's—"

"I won't talk to them!" Humphden snarled back.

The clerk withdrew, then reappeared. "Forgive me, Mr. Humphden," he insisted thickly, "but it's Mr. Blake of New Chelsea. He says he must talk to you."

"All right," Humphden caught up the telephone. He waited until the clerk told him that the clerk's receiver had been hung up, then snarled, "This is Humphden. What do you want?"

The precaution was unnecessary. The message was "strangely" worded. It would have meant nothing to an outsider, but Humphden had the key.

He hung up the receiver. And for a moment he allowed himself to be beaten down. Fear before a danger in the heat of battle and now become fulfillment, terrible, through the folly of another's ousted rage. Men, defeat, bankruptcy, paid before this new penalty which he must pay. And fear steadied him, cleared his brain. He wasted no time in futile regrets. His mind darted hither and thither, swift and calculating, pondering and rejecting a hundred avenues of escape from the peril which must be averted before he could set out to recoup his losses. There was no thought of saving Warren Blake—only himself.

Late in the day he went out to log the merry he had never shown.

Katherine Humphden was alone that evening. She was often alone now, days, but not entirely because, as she had told John Dunmado, she had been assigned a berth on the shelf reserved for unmarried females. There were many men who would have gladly undertaken to relieve her solitude. But these found her extremely unapproachable. Those whom she would have welcomed most gladly had least time for dalliance in drawing rooms.

The truth was, she was disappointed. Mature perception, quickened by a glimpse of a different ideal of life, had seen beyond the false setting of romance behind which men seek to hide the ugliness of the greedy, unscrupulous scramble for gold. She would have married Grege had it not been for the fact that the acid of his calling was seeping more and more clearly upon his frank, clean exterior a picture of what lay within. As it was, she had sent him away.

She was waiting for her father's homecoming. While she waited she glanced through the evening paper, to find the day's doings on the stock exchange were featured. The account had it that Humphden had been hard hit—even vaguely hinted that he might have to fail. She was amazed at the lack of emotion with which she read that their fortune, hitherto so potent and all-sufficing, had in a day been sadly shaken if not totally destroyed. She tried to picture to herself what it must mean to them—the economies, the privations even, the loss of caste among a set that measured worth by stocks and bonds. Somehow the picture could not profoundly alarm, partly perhaps because she knew too little of what to draw convincingly. She could not even feel deeply for her father, although she had for him a genuine daughter's affection and knew what a blow failure would be to him.

"Poor father!" she smiled half pity, half scorn. "I suppose nothing can persuade him that it isn't a horrible calamity. I ought to feel so, too, but—Hedge is this Katherine Humphden?"

She went on turning the pages of the paper until her casual glance was caught by a familiar name. In a satirical editorial under the caption "A Fool Errant" the fool errant was John Dunmado, recently—and happily, in the editor's opinion—disposed of at the primaries.

Her color deepened suddenly and for another reason. Memory had recalled to her something she had once said to this man. "When you were a broken down, middle-aged failure."

"I should be looking up at the men who were conquering."

Well, her prophecy had been fulfilled sooner than she had expected. He had been cast aside even by his own neck-bots. But there was something large and fine about him which forbade pity and commanded respect, made even such men as Grege, with their vitiated ideals, want to do him favors "on general principles."

"To think that I could have said that to him!" she cried to herself. "What a fool I was! If only I hadn't said 'I' at the men who were conquering!" John Dunmado, you tower above them all!"

She was still dreaming of John when her father came in.

His face was haggard, set in an ugly bitter scowl. The sympathy that had begun as she read of the wiping out of a fortune heaped when she saw the man who had lost it.

"Come in!" he said curtly.

She went to him quickly, laying an impulsive hand on his shoulder. "Oh, well, dear, never mind. It might be so much worse. You might have been taken sick or had an accident, or—anything. I've just been thinking how nice it would be to go back home to New Chelsea and start all over again in—something that wouldn't take all your time. I'd be so glad to get acquainted with you again." She gave a little laugh.

"You talk like a fool!" he replied roughly. "What could I do in that rotten, dirty grocery store? Here's where I can make money. And I can make all we need, once I get things straightened out. I've been broke before. The immediate question is to keep out of jail."

She started back from him with a gasp. "Out-of-jail! Father?"

"Out of jail, I said. I'm 'into' the New Chelsea bank and I've nothing left to pay with."

"Is it much?"

"It wasn't, but it is now."

"But we must pay it back. There are the bonds you gave me. And the New Chelsea houses that mother owns—she'll give those up. And—"

"Not a third enough."

She dropped weakly into a chair, staring at him foolishly. She was very pale, dazed by the sudden new calamity that had fallen.

"But surely," she insisted anxiously, "the bank won't press you. They know you'll pay it all back when you can."

"What do you know about it? It isn't the bank; it's the government that will make the trouble. That fool Blake is in worse than I am. The bank's gutted, cleaned out. And the bank examiner is over here. If he comes around—"

LEGISLATIVE COM- MITTEE REPORTS

traffic not only in this community, but of the state in general. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that the following laws affecting the liquor traffic should be enacted—first, an anti-treating law.
Second, the enactment of a law making the shipment of liquors to minors, Indians or other prohibited persons an offense punishable for both civil and criminal action in the county in which delivery is made.

Third, a law to further provide that the delivery of such illegal shipments may be prevented by notice to any common carrier from any duly constituted officer or proper relative of such prohibited consignee.

Fourth—The enactment of a law creating a state excise department or constabulary which department shall be charged with the enforcement of the liquor laws throughout the state.

In the opinion of your committee this last suggested enactment is of the most vital importance for the reason that an enactment of this character would tend to entirely divorce the enforcement of the liquor laws from local political influences which in the opinion of your committee is the greatest detriment to faithful enforcement of this class of statutory enactments.
In submitting this report, your committee respectfully suggests that such action as may be deemed advisable in bringing the above matters to the attention of our law-making powers be taken without delay.

ated $800 toward the expense of a federal farm management agent.
At the same time the board created no improvement association to supervise the county agent and they made Governor W. N. Ferris, chairman of the association. Mecosta is the seventh in the western Michigan territory to go after this county service.

The Parcel Post Booming.
Postmaster General Hitchcock is exceedingly gratified at the phenomenal success of the parcel post which was inaugurated on January 1st. The first three weeks of the operation of this system resulted in selling 340,000,000 parcel post stamps and in collecting over $15,000,000 for revenue for the post office department from this service. This is an exceedingly large showing and it illustrates how popular this service has become.

COLD WEATHER MAXIMS.

It takes as much energy for stock to fight the cold as it does to fight the flies.

When your stock huddle around an open straw stack rather than go to the shelter you have provided for them, there is something wrong with the temperature of the latter.

In lee cold weather keep the pregnant cows or mares blanketed a few weeks before giving birth to their young. The heat thrown out by the bodies of animals is of small value if the sheds are high and open.

A hog house with a floor over an open foundation is a very poor place to raise young pigs.

Shelter for animals is not only humane, but it shows up in the feed bins or in the bony animals in the spring.

Some very cold days take a thermometer into the stock barn or shed and see how cold it is.—

STAMINA IN HORSES.

Points That Indicate Constitutional Vigor and Staying Power.

There is no more important qualification to be sought for in horses required for real work than that they should be endowed with constitution and vigor, writes a correspondent of American Cultivator. It is upon the possession of these attributes as much as anything that their usefulness and their ability to stand the stress of continuous work day after day depend.

It is, unfortunately, not always possible to glean any reliable knowledge regarding this question of constitution from a study of the external appearance of a horse, and many a good looking animal, with perfect points and conformation, of which one would never suspect it, judging from the horse's looks, proves to be a "soft brute," to use the horseman's favorite term for describing this kind, when put to the test of continuous hard work. There are, however, at any rate, certain indications which in many cases afford a more or less conclusive clue in regard to this question.

For instance, a very light middle is generally considered to indicate that a horse is deficient in constitution and bottom, and usually with every reason.
The explanation why this should be so is simple. If the middle piece has an unduly small compass there is not much room for the development of

The Percheron horse is one of the most popular of the heavy draft breeds. For heavy work on the farm or in the city he ranks according to none. The Percheron yearling shown here is Ohio's Hero.
He was first prize winner in the Ohio Percheron Futurity at the Ohio state fair of 1912. He is owned by the Ohio State university.

either—the digestive tract, the lungs or the heart—this last the center of the circulatory system, and this must necessarily restrict the amount of work these organs are capable of doing, and as the vital processes depend entirely upon them the output of vital energy is correspondingly limited, which in its turn results in a diminishment of the horse's constitutional vigor. Similarly when a horse is slack loined one will in most cases be right in concluding that the animal is more or less soft.
A herring got or tucked up shape of the barrel also, as a rule, belokens want of constitution as well as of stamina, and it is a generally accepted axiom that in order to possess plenty of staying power at fast paces a horse must not only have ample depth of girth, but also requires to be deep through the loins and full at the flank.
There are, it is true, occasionally exceptions to this; but, on the whole, the rule holds good enough.

A big barrel is a most desirable feature, for of all outward points this is the one most indicative of stoutness and bottom in a horse. Weak constitu-tioned horses, of course, carry quite a good sized barrel when not doing much work, but they are very soon found to run up light behind the girth under the stress of continuous severe exertion, whereas stout and hard horses will continue carrying a big barrel and thriving well, no matter how severely they are being worked.

Skim milk For Young Stock.
Skim milk is valuable as a hog feed because of the protein and ash it carries. These have high value in building the frame of young animals. The greater value will be realized from feeding skim milk to young pigs. It is of great value to sows suckling pigs.
Buttermilk has practically the same composition as skim milk, although it is somewhat richer in fat. Whey is worth half as much for pig feeding as skim milk.

HIS RISE TO POWER

now— With a gesture he sketched the impending catastrophe.

"Stephen, what is the matter now?" came a laughing voice from the doorway. "And please, for my sake, lower your voice. It's so vulgar to talk loudly before servants." Mrs. Hamilton entered and, with an air of utter exhaustion, deposited her substantial self in an easy chair.

"Father," Katherine explained, with cruel brevity, "this lost his money."

It was an unexpected tone. The invalid suddenly sat bolt upright and almost shrieked. "Lost our money? Do you mean to say, Stephen Hamilton, that you've been so foolish enough to gamble our money away after all I've suffered and denied myself?"

She threw her hands aloft and fell back moaning. "Oh, in my weak condition, you say that."

"Mother, you're a fraud. Even with your business and intelligence you're the picture of vulgar health."

Mrs. Hamilton rose. She managed a stinger that would have done credit to Bernhardt, clutched at tables and chairs for the doubtfully necessary support of the room.

Hamilton growled again, uninterestedly.

"Father, isn't there something to be done?"

"Annoyed! I've an appointment with him in New Orleans tomorrow. Some of his rascally politicians are in as deep as Blake and I."

"Can he help?"

"He can. And he's got to."

"Do you mind if I go up with you tomorrow?"

"All right. And I wish," he exclaimed, "that you'd go away and let me alone."

In her darkened room Katherine sat by the window for a long time, thinking

ing with a feeling of sickening disgust on the scold scene between her parents just enacted. This was the other side, the unlamented side of that splendid life of conquest for which she had put the best of all her life. Thus it made victims of all her virtues. She thought of John.

THE GROWTH OF GOOD ROADS

Demand For Better Highways Is Nation Wide.

"GET OUT OF THE RUT."

Every One Is Awakening to the Value of Good Roads and the Remedy for Poor Ones—Up to the Farmers—Cooperation Is Essential.

The good roads movement throughout the country has awakened the farmer to the necessity of good roads for the promotion of rapid transit in marketing his farm products.

In Wisconsin great interest is being taken by farmers in the building of new roads. Several appropriations have been made in the various counties, running into hundreds of thousands of dollars, and business men and farmers are co-operating with the state and government authorities with a common end in view—good roads.

In the county of Kent, Wis., $800,000 has been appropriated for the building of new roads, and the Good Road club has promised to pay an amount equal to that raised by the farmers, by subscription in the county.

Scarcely a magazine is published at the present time which does not devote some part of its pages to the mention of good roads, and it would seem that day by day the movement is becoming more national and stronger in its scope. The especially pleasing feature is that the farmers are taking a big interest in it.

In the state of Ohio a retired manufacturer, who recently has acquired and cultivated one of the largest private farms in the country, intends, in addition to making his farm a model one, to have everything that goes with

PART OF THE MASSACHUSETTS STATE ROAD. It is in first class shape. The improvements intended will include good highways and byways throughout the state, making them passable both in the summer and in the winter.

Good roads help the farmer as much as and more directly than the city man. A farmer whose home, gardens and crops are, say, ten miles from market may find it absolutely impossible to market his products when prices for staples are highest in fall, winter and spring. If his roads have not been improved, winter is too far in a social or business way for the farmer whose roads have been improved.

In Colorado and North Carolina the things are being done in road building, and concrete is being poured in converting impassable roads into decent highways.

Private enterprise also has entered into the construction of new roads, and motorcar owners in the Fox river valley, Wisconsin, have each subscribed $10 for the construction of a road seven miles long between the two cities of Neenah and Menasha and Appleton.

The increasing popularity of the automobile among farmers is sure to stimulate greater promotion of good road building. The wear and tear on an automobile is lessened considerably when traveling over an even, smooth road, greater speed is attained, and the life of tires is increased considerably when they are subjected to a level surface, instead of ruts and holes that scrape the outer casing and injure the fabric. A city motorist endeavors to keep out of car tracks because of the bad and injurious effect they have on the tires of his car, but the farmer has no alternative when he travels over bad roads. He must strike the ruts, and the only remedy then is good roads.

A Road Building Station.

The road board of Great Britain is about to establish a novel station for testing different materials and methods of road construction in connection with the national physical laboratory at Teddington. A circular track will be provided, and a number of expert mechanical "roaders" will be successful built thereon. The effect of these will then be tried the effects of various vehicles, running at various speeds, taking account of width of tires, circumference of wheels, motor power, etc. Laboratory tests will also be made.

DOES IT PAY TO SHRED STOVER

By C. J. Fillweber, of I. H. C. Service Bureau

Shredded stover increases its feeding value. First Henry of the University of Wisconsin has conducted experiments which show that shredded stover is about 21 per cent more valuable when fed to milk cows than it is to the plain form. It is also estimated that about 25 per cent of the feeding value of corn stalks is lost by allowing the stalks to stand in the field two months. Allowing corn to stand in the field not only decreases its value, but it increases the difficulty of the cull.

Just remember this: every time you carry an armful of stalks into the barn 20 per cent of the digestible nutrients contained in the feed so for the production of physical energy necessary for doing external work. If percent is used for keeping up the body, and 25 per cent is needed in the milk pail.

If you handle your corn crop properly you will find 25 per cent of the total nutrients in the stalks, and 65 per cent in the ear, but if you allow the stalks to stand in the field to be beaten by the winter's storm, a man expert to lose anywhere from 15 per cent to 50 per cent of the total feeding value of the stalks. On the average, corn from two to three tons of stover are grown. In the stalks produced on an acre of average corn, there are approximately 85 pounds of protein, 1,500 pounds of carbohydrates, and 22 pounds of other extract. A steer weighing 1,000 pounds requires one-half of a pound of protein, 6 pounds of carbohydrates and about one-fourth of a pound of other extract daily. Flavored to an exactness, there are carbohydrates enough in an acre of corn to last a steer ten months, other extract enough to keep him in proper condition for eight months, and protein in sufficient quantity to sustain him for six months.

Probably the only argument against shredding is the cost of preparation. When flensed in dollars and cents, the cost of husking and shredding with a machine is practically the same as for hand work. Figures compiled by men who feed whole stalks, by users of shredded stover, and by the owners of machines give the following facts:

Cost of husking 25 acres of shocked corn, and getting the fodder in a stack. The quality of corn used for the basts of the following tables is slightly above the average, forty bushels to the acre being taken as a standard. The cost of labor is figured at current rates.

Cost of husking 1,000 bushels by hand at 1 cents a bushel. $10.00
Board for man during husking, averaging 50 bushels per day, for 21 days at $4.50 per week. 13.50

Cost of handling husked corn and fodder from the field, men and team, 5 days at $2.00 per day. 10.00
Board for man during husking, averaging 50 bushels per day, for 21 days at $4.50 per week. 13.50

Board for team for 7 days at 75 cents per day. 5.25
Board for team for 7 days at 50 cents per day. 3.50

Total cost of getting corn in crib and fodder in stack. $91.00

Cost of husking and shredding 25 acres of corn, flensed the year at 40 bushels per acre, and at average day's work of 50 bushels. A hand-husker and shredder working under ideal conditions has husked 1,000 bushels of corn in a day, but to be conservative we are requiring those figures considerably. We are also figuring the cost of doing the husking and shredding strictly on a bushel basis. In many localities owners of huskers and shredders prefer to work by the day rather than by the bushel.

For hire of husker and shredder, including the services of engine, 1,000 bushels at 40 cents. $40.00

Three men pitching in the field, 15 days at $2.00 each per day. 7.50

Six men to haul stover from the field, 15 days at $2.00 each per day. 15.00

Six teams and wagons for drawing stover to the machine, 15 days at $1.50 per day per team. 11.25

Fuel. 6.00

One man for shoveling corn into crib, 15 days at $2.00 per day. 30.00

Board for fourteen men, 14 days at 75 cents per day. 13.13

Feed rationed for six teams, 15 days at 50 cents per team. 3.75

Total. $98.75

$98.75 minus $91.00 equals $7.75 or cost of shredded stover. Since two tons of stover are produced on an acre, and twenty-five acres are shredded, fifty tons of shredded stover are secured. As $7.75 was the cost of the shredded stover the expense of doing the work with a machine when distributed amounts to approximately 16 cents per ton more than the cost of husking the corn and of stacking the corn stalks. Besides less stover is required for the shredded stover.

There is a practically no loss or waste of leaves or husks and the stalks are in an excellent condition for feeding. They not only act as an absorbent, a source of absorbent stover absorbing 2.5 pounds of liquid, but the vegetable matter is returned to the soil in all forms of humus. The fertilizing value of the stalks harvested on an acre area worth about $7.00 or about $175.00 worth of fertilizer can be returned to the field.

MEASURING HAY IN STACK

Reply to Andrew Wright, Silewood, Sask. "Will you please send me a formula for measuring hay in the stack?"

For obtaining the number of tons of hay in a stack, the first step is to measure the width and length with a tape line, and then what is known as the "throw," that is, pass a tape line from the bottom of the stack on one side over to the bottom on the other side and divide this measure into two equal parts. The number of cubic feet of hay in the stack is then found by multiplying the width, the length, and the throw, and then dividing the result by 128, which is the number of cubic feet in a ton. If the stack is of irregular shape, divide it into two or three parts, measure each part separately, and then add the results together to get the total number of cubic feet. With newly stacked hay it will take about 500 cubic feet to equal a ton, if it has been stacked for two to three months, from 350 to 400 cubic feet will equal a ton. After you have obtained the number of cubic feet in the stack, divide by the number of cubic feet in a ton, taking into consideration the length of time that the hay has been stacked.

SAVE THE FODDER

Although it is too late in the season, to consider doing anything with the corn for ensilage purposes, we should not overlook the fact that to save the fodder which we have already cut is not only our duty but is very important for the standpoint of having sufficient food for our livestock during the winter months.

Of the many ways to save the crop, the use of the silo is perhaps the best, and yet only a few of the farmers in the corn belt have taken advantage of this means of saving the corn crop. This season and we should look right now to investigate the silo problem so that we can crop one next year. The silo not only saves 30 to 40 per cent of the corn, but it affords a green and succulent feed during the winter months.

Crop reports sent out by the extension show that the farm value of hay as quoted October 15, is about what less than it was October 15, 1911, but yet it is higher by a considerable amount than usual in the words this indicates that the means of rough food available throughout the winter is less than normal and for this reason we should put forth extra efforts to save all the fodder and rough feed we can get. It is a common mistake to believe that corn comes in machine made fodder. When we consider the increased value of hay and the fact that the fodder is left standing in the field from 25 to 40 per cent of its feeding value is lost we will realize how important it is to form our plans now to save this fodder in the best possible shape.

Perhaps you have not done so, for you have seen your neighbors have the corn fodder in the fields during the winter months and had it in the after day as it was required. This is bad practice, to say the least, and we hope that no reader of the Service Bureau will be found guilty of this practice this season. Late fall rain coupled with occasional sleet or snow storms not only waste a considerable amount of the fodder but make it extremely difficult to handle if left in the field. Fodder left exposed in this manner loses its feeding value through the loss of protein caused by the action of the elements and by the wasting of leaves due to handling.

The best practice is to stack the fodder as soon as the corn is picked. It is a good idea to have the feeding rack or in the south side of a grove where the fodder can be fed during the cold winter months by scattering it on the ground where the animals will be protected from the cold northwest winds.

This brings us to the subject of shredding fodder, which is the most important of all the best ways of saving a fodder crop. The husker and shredder now in common use cuts stalks in longitudinal sections, but small bits which pass in a more palatable form. It has been found that live stock will eat no more of the stalk when shredded

The Easy Laxative

In justice to yourself you should try Rexall Orderlies—your money back if you don't like them. They are a candy confection that really do give easy relief from constipation.

Good health is largely dependent upon the bowels. When they become sluggish the waste material that is thrown off by the system accumulates. This condition generates poisons which circulate throughout the body, leading to constipation, indigestion, headache, dullness of vision, nervousness, listlessness and other annoyances.

Avoid harsh cathartics and physics. They give but temporary relief. They also aggravate the constipation. They are particularly bad for children, delicate or aged persons.

Rexall Orderlies

Given in tablet form, taste just like candy and are suited for the easiest, quickest action in the bowels. They don't purge, grip, cause nervousness, or lead to constipation. They act upon the bowels at once, and the material is passed off in a day.

Children like Rexall Orderlies. They are ideal for aged or delicate persons.

CAREFUL: Beware of imitations. Rexall Orderlies are not sold by all drug stores. You can buy Rexall Orderlies in this community only at our store:

when fed whole. The machine is for this purpose will deliver the corn in a husked condition. The cost of shredding varies, of course, in different localities, but figuring the average cost of husking corn and stover, the expense of shredding is practically the same. Then you will not only get the corn husked and stover, but you will have your fodder in a convenient form for storing and feeding. It is a good plan to store the shredded fodder in the hay mow or in some place where it can be covered. It is also a plan for you to do the stack, the shredded fodder, close to where you intend to feed it. This will not only save labor but will reduce losses in handling and heating. The shredded fodder is another advantage of shredding the fodder which is often an idea of the convenience in handling the stable manure. It is perhaps unnecessary to call the Corn Belt farmers' attention to this fact. Let us plan right now to let large stacks of fodder and if possible use a shredder.

FOR BETTER FARMING

New Venture in Teaching of Systematic Agriculture at Kingsley.

Superintendent of Schools Clark of That City Will Establish Night Schools

The subject of scientific agriculture has taken such a hold among the farmers and rural growers of western Michigan that classes are being organized for the purpose of systematic study. Short courses under the auspices of the Agricultural College have been announced for five high schools. But even these courses do not seem to be sufficient, and Supt. A. H. Clark of the Kingsley school has evolved a plan which, he believes, will help fill the demand. Beginning with February 3, he will conduct a Monday night school for the farmers living close to Kingsley. The course will be made up of practical men and will be arranged to meet their specific needs.

To start with Supt. Clark will lay stress upon those parts of chemistry, mineralogy, zoology, plant life, and physical geography as relate to farming, that the farmer may see the value of these sciences in connection with his vocation.

This is the first night school for farmers in the western Michigan territory and the result of the experiment will be closely watched that other schools may be started if this is a success.

Make Us Prove It

We guarantee to refund every penny paid us for Rexall Orderlies if they do not give entire satisfaction. We ask no price for them. We are in no way abusing you. Your money would be refunded to us promptly and cheerfully returned the money.

Doesn't that mean that Rexall Orderlies must be right? You must know we would not dare make such a promise unless we were positively certain that all Orderlies will do all we claim for them. There is no money here to be made for a trial of Rexall Orderlies, and in justice to yourself, you should not hesitate to test them.

Rexall Orderlies come in convenient packages of 10, 25 and 50 tablets. Grange Column

Ironton Grange.
Ironton grange met in regular session January 28, with an attendance of 28 members and one visitor from Wilson grange.
One application for membership was received.
Reports were made of visits to other granges.
Lecturer's program consisted of a very interesting discussion on, How We Could Make a Better Grange.
Song, Sister J. Kemp.
Recitation, Sister F. Fridson.
Under Goad of the Order, Sister Cora Hammond played a march and the members marched to the Master's desk and received the new manual word. The penny march took place at the same time. A lively discussion was had in regard to putting a new floor in. At the close the grange gave the play committee, or the "Useless Bunch" (as they preferred to call them), the privilege of putting the new floor in the hall.
After several other good suggestions grange closed to meet again in two weeks.

MRS. HARKNESS DEAD

Was One of the Oldest Settlers in This Region—Leaves One Daughter.

Mary A. Huntington was born in Whitley, Ontario, September 16th, 1838, and died in Barnard January 28th, 1913, aged 74 years. She was one of a family of 13 children, only two of whom remain. Mrs. McKee of Charlevoix is a sister.
She was united in marriage to Henry Harkness February 2, 1861, and five years later came to Michigan. Very few settlers were here at that time. They had but one child, Mrs. A. J. Beattie.
Mrs. Harkness united with the church at the age of 15 and it was the beginning of a long and useful Christian life. Her home was noted for hospitality and she leaves a host of friends.

She is safe among God's treasures. Guarded by an Angel Band, In the wondrous realm of Glory.
She has gone beyond Death's River, Left this world of pain and strife, And has gained a crown immortal, Growing Gift, Eternal Life. Adv.

CIRCUIT COURT IN SESSION

Jury Disagreed in Wheaton Case—Verdict of Not Guilty in Melor Case.

Circuit court is grinding away in regular February session. Up to the time of going to press the following cases have been disposed of:

Applications for citizenship, all allowed except Cohen, Wyers, Rosenthal and Gerrie, which were continued until next term.

The case of People vs. Wheaton, assault with intent to commit rape, tried, jury disagreed.

People vs. Melor, violation of the liquor law, verdict of not guilty.

People vs. Brown, desertion, on trial.

LENT COMES EARLY

Not for One Hundred Years Will Easter Fall as Early as This Year.

For only the fourth time since 1789, 125 years ago, Lent will begin this year today. Easter will fall on March 23. This forty-day season prescribed by the church as one of fasting and prayer never has begun any earlier, except in one year, 1818, Easter that year fell on March 22.

Owing to the early arrival of Lent the season will be one of the shortest on record. Easter has frequently fallen as late as April 15 or 17, and probably will hit in and around some of these dates between 1914 and 2013.

In the latter year, according to church almanac, the date will again be March 23. So those who suffer by a falling off of business this winter in consequence of the early date need not look for a repetition of this situation during their lifetime, for it will not happen again in 100 years. Easter came as early as March 23 in 1788, 1845 and 1856.

LITTLE INTEREST SHOWN

In the Coming City Primary—Several Candidates for County Road Commissioners.

Although the time is fast passing away when petitions must be filed for the primary, little interest is being shown in the coming city primary, probably on account of general approval of the present condition of the city.

Petitions are being circulated asking for the renomination of Mayor Nordum and Justice Collins, also for the nomination of Art Alcock for city treasurer. For the ward officers, the present incumbents will probably be asked to run again and the names of Will Scroggie in the first, and F. E. Carter in the second, are mentioned for aldermen.

In the county George W. Henton, Albert Juhenville and Ed Lorch, all of Boyne City, have filed petitions for nomination for county road commissioners, while we have heard the names of Horace B. Hipp of East Jordan and Joe Courier of Eveline mentioned.

Bananas, 20c. dozen; lettuce, 12c. pound; oranges, 12c. dozen; quart cans chow chow, 10c.; quart cans pickles, 10c.; quart cans green olives, 25c.; Quaker corn flakes, 5c.; good coffee, 25c. pound; grape fruit, 4 for 25c. Mrs. B. W. Miller. Adv. 61f

Importance of Little Belgium.
Belgium is virtually the smallest independent country in the world in point of size and yet stands eighth in a list of the wealth of nations and sixth in the total of her export and import trade. Belgium is the commercial and industrial balance wheel of the trade of the world. With a slightly lower wage scale than prevails elsewhere, even in Germany, Belgium is able to share prices just sufficiently to act as a check upon bids for international business. A Belgium twenty times as great as it is and preserving the same intensity of industrial life and purpose would dominate the trade of the world.—James Davenport Whelpley in Century.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PLAY.

Don Silva, a Knight of the Cross and commander of Redmar, has been intrusted with the defense of the Christian frontier against the Moors. He is betrothed to Fedalma, and because his friends are urging him not to marry her, on the ground that she is an infidel, he determines to postpone an attack upon the Moors and marry her at once. Just as the arrangements for their secret marriage have been completed and Fedalma is preparing for her wedding on the following day, Zarea, chief of a Gypsy band, sends an ally to the Moorish king, finds Fedalma and convinces her that she is his child. He and his followers have been made captives by Don Silva, and he demands that Fedalma help them to escape and go with them as their queen. Believing it to be her duty to obey him, she leaves a farewell message for Don Silva and goes with Zarea as the Gypsy queen. Don Silva follows her to the Gypsy encampment, and in order to be near her, takes the oath of allegiance to Zarea and becomes a Zin-cala. A quarrel arises between the two men and is about to end in violence when the Lord of Aguilari enters and proves, with the aid of Shepards (an old astrologer), that Fedalma is his daughter. Shepards reveals the secret which he has kept for many years. Zarea renounces Fedalma, and the Lord of Aguilari consents to her marriage with Don Silva.

CHEESECLOTH FOR TRUCK.

Better Than Glass as a Shelter For Growing Vegetables.

The past summer, for the first time, tried cheesecloth shelters in our kitchen garden, says a Country Gentleman writer. Next summer I am going to have more vegetables under cheesecloth, for it is great stuff. Some old lumber about eight inches wide. I cut them up into pieces fifteen inches long. Four of these pieces nailed together made a square frame—a box with out top or bottom. Over the top I tacked a piece of cheesecloth. There was lumber for only twenty-four of them, and I put eight over some cucumber plants started in the house eight over watermelons and eight over muskmelons. Results were most definite. We had cucumbers from the sheltered vines two weeks earlier than usual, and watermelons as big as muskmelons. Results were most definite. We had cucumbers from the sheltered vines two weeks earlier than usual, and watermelons as big as muskmelons. Results were most definite. We had cucumbers from the sheltered vines two weeks earlier than usual, and watermelons as big as muskmelons. Results were most definite.

When the vines under cloth outgrew the frames I removed them. Just then I was nursing along a dozen eggplants. With bugs, dry weather and other disadvantages, it seemed as if they would not live. Twelve of the frames were clapped over these plants, and in a few days the effect could be seen in their healthy green leaves. Then some brussels sprouts came for transplanting in July, when the sky was like brass. I put them right out as soon as received, with a cheesecloth frame over each, and they grew as if they had been transplanted in a week of rain.

Cheesecloth is cheap. If you buy a half of it, about seventy-five yards, it costs about 25 cents a yard. The coarse, unbleached variety a yard wide is what you want.

Points For the Thinking Farmer.

Now is an excellent time to lay that concrete walk that you promised your wife to make last winter, when the mud was ankle deep. These are excellent months for odd jobs on the farm.

No kind of manure, other animal excrement or fertilizers, will take the place of good, thorough tillage. Plow the land at the right time and to the right depth; then work it down to a mellow seed bed with disk and roller and harrow.

A brick wall or foundation, while substantial enough, looks rather out of fashion now. The concrete or cement block foundation is the modern type and the most modern thing, an improvement over that which preceded it. A great thing about concrete is its permanence and cheapness.

CLOVER FOR THE SOIL.

It Will Make Poor Land Richer and Can Be Grown Easily.

The trouble with soils when they cease to produce as they did when new is not that the elements of plant food are actually exhausted from the soil, but the necessary forces for the liberation are exhausted. One of these forces is bacteria. It is estimated that in the common soil there are 100 million bacteria to the ounce. These bacteria must have humus (decayed vegetable matter) for their food; they will liberate food for the growth of plants.

The supply of humus, the supply of nitrogen, the physical condition of the soil, the penetration, aeration and porosity of the subsoil, can be established by the growth of sweet clover, a clover which is a legume. It is one of the hardest of the leguminous plants. It seems to establish itself on old, wornout soils where other legumes will not grow at all and where field crops grow so poorly as not to pay. Owing to these characteristics and to the fact that its bacteria are capable of living and prospering in the roots of alfalfa, it is perhaps the best possible plant with which to precede alfalfa in sections where there is difficulty in securing a successful growth of that plant.—Kansas Industrialist.

AT AGE OF NINETY-SEVEN

Mrs. Margaret Clark Died at the Home of Her Son Monday Morning.

Mrs. Margaret Clark an aged resident of this city died Monday morning at 2:30.

Margaret Webster was born December 18, 1815 at Whiteinch, Canada and married Samuel Clark when quite young, coming to Charlevoix 35 years ago. For the past 22 years she has made her home with her son George. She leaves five children, three sons, George and Henry of this city and Edward of Petoskey and two daughters, Elizabeth and Margaret of Massachusetts.

August 3, Mrs. Clark had her first stroke, another following in September and the fatal stroke last Sunday.

The funeral was held from the house Tuesday at 2:30 p. m. Rev. B. Ackerson of the Baptist church officiating.

WHAT THE ADVANTAGES ARE

Of the Commission Form of Government for Municipalities.

CONTINUATION OF ARTICLE

Which Was Begun in Last Week's Issue of the Courier.

Fewer Officials Places Responsibility Where it Properly Belongs—Many Other Advantages Claimed for System.

There are certain very definite advantages claimed for the commission plan of government by its advocates, among which those which we propose to discuss at this time are the most important.

It is claimed, first of all, that this form of city government is especially valuable because through it the responsibility for official action is fixed. One of the commonest occurrences in connection with the conduct of municipal government is the shifting of responsibility from one official or board to another official or board, which is made possible by our present complicated governmental systems. For example, in the city of Charlevoix, we have the mayor and the common council and a number of municipal boards, such as the board of education, the board of public works, the board of health, the cemetery board. Each of these boards has certain matters under its direct supervision, and has a certain measure of power in connection with the same, yet, with the possible exception of the school board, each one of these boards must gain the support and approval of the common council before it can act effectively. It has frequently happened with us, as it has in many other cities, that matters of great public interest have failed of performance because of lack of co-operation between different parts of the city government. Even in the case of the mayor and the common council, there have been at times such even divisions of numbers and opinion that the public business has been hampered, and it is always difficult under these conditions accurately to fix the blame, because each conflicting part of the government stands in a certain measure upon its own rights and has something to say in its own defense. It is claimed that this difficulty will be eliminated by the adoption of the commission plan of government, since under that plan each part of the city government is confined to the hands of one man, who is practically supreme in his own department, and who, therefore, can be held directly responsible for any failure of administration which occurs. While this contention may be conceded, on the other hand it may be urged that a change in the methods of municipal government which is essentially revolutionary is not necessary in order that responsibility may be definitely fixed. This branch of the question will be more fully discussed when we consider some of the objections to the commission form of government, but it seems that there is much reason in the contention that, if responsibility for official action can be definitely located without a radical departure from those principles of government to which we have become attached and of the wisdom of which we have become convinced, then it would be better to accomplish this result in some such way.

2nd. Another claim is that the commission form of government gives a greatly increased efficiency of management. To use an illustration which is suggested by our conditions—we find that in our city there are a great many public officials, elected or appointed, between whom the government of the city is divided. The argument is made that such a system of management would be inconceivable in connection with any but public business; that any corporation or company of businessmen would never dream of instituting such a complicated and tangled system of management; that efficiency depends upon the concentration of power in a few hands, and where there are many who share in power, with a certain system of checks and balance in force between them, slowness and inefficiency are bound to result. This is probably true. Five men can handle a business much more efficiently than fifty, but, granting this, it is also true that one man can handle a business much more efficiently than five. It may be seriously questioned whether the argument for the commission form of government, if pushed to its logical conclusion, would not be an argument for absolutism; for if the concentration of power for the sake of efficiency is a good thing, why not carry it to its legitimate result and concentrate it in the fewest possible number of hands? It has frequently been said that theoretically the best government conceivable is benevolent absolutism. But we are bound to consider the fact that there is a great difference between private business and public business. In the matter of a corporation there may be hundreds or even thousands of shareholders, but in the matter of a city government there may be hundreds or even thousands of taxpayers.

ABANDONING OLD SYSTEM

Of District Schools in Various Parts of the State of Michigan.

The People are Waking up to the Advantages of Township Unit System.

Michigan, though very slowly to be sure, is gradually waking up to the advantage of larger school organization unit. It seems a hard struggle to give up the present inefficient, highly expensive and unsatisfactory district system which has been outgrown for years. The growth of the township unit system idea has, however, been most encouraging during the past two years. Quite a number of township have voted for this form of organization and many more are considering the proposition. Township unit districts have been formed in all parts of the state during the last two years but the greatest increase is in the northern counties. Confusion with the idea of centralization of schools is a perpetual hindrance to the proposition. The establishment of a township unit district does not mean one schoolhouse only in the township to which children of all grades must be transported. It does not mean the closing of local schools, thus compelling children to go away from home to attend school.

The township unit system means the application of the city organization to the township. For instance the city high school is used by all of the students from various parts of the city while scattered around in various wards are located as many grade schools as are necessary to take care of the little ones in those particular vicinities. All the schools are under one board which employs all the teachers, and the rate of taxation is the same throughout the city.

In the township the district boundaries would be erased, a board of five elected at large would run as many of the one-room schools as necessary and if practical would maintain a township high school available for every boy and girl in the townships. The people are protected against injustice in that any electors may appeal from any action of the school board to the state Superintendent of Public Instruction who has full authority to determine the question.

Under the township unit system, school is maintained for the same length of term throughout the township, the taxes are spread over the township thus equalizing that matter. The primary money is equitably distributed over the township and a much more just and equitable condition is thus established. When desirable it is possible to have located in a convenient part of the township a high school which will give to the boys and girls in the country equal educational advantages with their town or city cousins; which will make it possible for the parents to keep their children under the direct influence of the home during the most critical period of their lives and still not deprive them of high school training; which will make it possible to give them an education particularly fitted to their needs and will give to every boy and girl in the township an equal chance.

SEVERAL CANDIDATES ENTERED IN CITY FOR PRIMARY CONTEST

Nordrum and Nicholls Republican Candidates for Mayor—Several Warm Contests Promised for Alderman—Little Opposition Manifested for Supervisors—Democrats Will Place a Full Ticket in the Field.

Today is the last day that petitions for nomination to the several city offices can be filed, and a good field of candidates are in the race. For the Republicans Olaf Nordrum has filed asking for renomination to the office of mayor while a petition has been filed with the name of Harry Nichols. Mr. Nordrum would run on his record as mayor the past year, while the friends of Mr. Nichols urge his nomination on the grounds of his previous record as president of the village and the desirability of having at the head of our municipal government a man with his broad and successful experience in the conduct of large business enterprises, and the fact that he is one of the heaviest taxpayers in the city, who has always been a liberal contributor and willing worker in all plans for the development of the city.

For city clerk, the present clerk E. J. Miller, will probably have no opposition and the same is true of Art Alcock for city treasurer.

For justice of the peace W. H. Collins will be opposed by James M. Ellis.

The following are the Republican candidates who are in the race:

FIRST WARD.
Supervisor—E. J. Neech.
Aldermen—L. S. See, Henry Sherman, F. H. Wilkinson.

SECOND WARD.
Supervisor—Charles J. Zettler.
Aldermen—Fred E. Cartier.

THIRD WARD.
Supervisor—Amos Webster, M. A. Levinson.

Aldermen—R. S. Snaption, L. P. Adams, L. E. Benton, John J. Fagan.

The Democrats will put a full ticket in the field for the first time in the history of the city. Their ticket will be made up as follows: Mayor—William Finnan.
Clerk—Allen Campbell.
Justice—George Anderson.

FIRST WARD.
Supervisor—George Pappin.

Aldermen—John A. Auld.

SECOND WARD.
Aldermen—Frank M. Harris.

Constable—Thomas E. Noyes.

THIRD WARD.
Supervisor—W. H. Miller.

Aldermen—Alonzo Powers, Thomas J. Bacon.

Constable—Pete McCafferty.

WILL WIND UP BIG WARD ESTATE

Valued at Several Millions of Dollars in Timber and Land Interests.

Including Thousands of Acres of Valuable Timber in Northern Michigan and California.

The trustees of the David Ward estate have decided to close out all the timber holdings of this great estate and convert them into other securities in order to settle up the estate with as much speed as possible.

The last issue of the American Lumberman, the leading trade paper of the lumber interests, contained a three-page advertisement of the Ward estate giving the particulars concerning the proposed sale and stating as a reason for taking this action that the heirs to the large property have not been able to reach an agreement regarding the settlement of the estate and for this fact no other alternative appears open to complete the settlement of the estate.

The advertisement states that the entire holdings comprising many thousands of acres of timber and other land in northern Michigan as well as the thousands of acres of very valuable timber land in California will be disposed of at a sacrifice in order to wind up the estate.

The estate is valued at several millions of dollars in its timber and land interests alone. The result of the present action will probably be to see the land and timber holdings pass to other large corporations which will finish up the timber cutting begun on this property in northern Michigan by the estate while the important interests in California will also undoubtedly find quick sale.

QUESTION OF LEADERSHIP

Secretary Ball of Rural Y. M. C. A. Gives Qualifications of Leader.

Held Responsible for Work of the Several Groups into Which County is Divided.

The growth of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association in North America has been phenomenal. When first organized on this continent the city type of work was the only one known. Since that time the following branches have been added—railroad, army, navy, student and rural. With the exception of the latter all have placed strong emphasis on buildings and equipment rather than on the personality. So to the rural Y. M. C. A. belongs the credit for demonstrating that right leadership, more than buildings and equipment, makes for better manhood.

Naturally then, a discussion of the rural Y. M. C. A. would lead primarily to a discussion of the problem of leadership; the discovery, enlistment and training of which is the important work of the employed officer. This plan for supplying the necessary leadership from amongst the men of the country not only brings the boys in contact with personalities that inspire but it leaves the country wealthier in the ways of leadership than it ever has been before.

It goes without saying that the ideal leader would be a man who placed proper emphasis on spiritual development, was well educated and a splendid athlete. However, no county is over run with the ideal in leadership so we take particular interest in securing the services of the average. An average leader should possess some of the following qualifications and the capacity for developing those not possessed at the beginning: Christian character, dependability, tactfulness, firmness, straight-forwardness, punctuality and the ability to appreciate humor. The two qualifications which are primary, and necessary at the out start to insure success are Christian character and dependability. The former is indispensable and the latter is more to be desired than any of the others.

After a leader has been secured for a group of boys, and the work properly organized, he, and not the county secretary, is responsible for the success of the work in that group. It is the leader's duty to be present at all meetings of the group and to direct all the group activities. No work shall be taken up by a group unless it is sanctioned by the leader and the county committee reserves the right to veto any action that may have been approved by both the group and the leader.

Leaders conferences held at stated intervals tend to increase the efficiency of the group leaders. During these meetings the members of the staff force lend their assistance in giving information that will be of help in developing the work of the groups and the opportunity these meetings afford for the interchange of ideas on the part of the group leaders is very important.

In the last analysis the amount of work that can be done and the success of the work undertaken is dependant upon the caliber of the volunteer leadership. To the volunteer leader belongs the credit for things accomplished and the joy of being a part of a plan which is having an important effect on the young life of the country.

TWO NUMBERS LECTURE COURSE

Professor Pickens Will Appear February 14—Bargelt Company February 17

Both are of the Highest Class and are Highly Recommended by Press and Public.

The next two numbers of the citizens lecture course comes close together; Professor Pickens appearing Friday evening, February 14 and the Bargelt company Monday evening, February 17. The following tells who Professor Pickens is and what his reputation is as a platform orator.

Mr. Pickens is a graduate of Yale, having worked his way through this most aristocratic institution, and also winning highest oratorical honors. As a man who has conquered the influences of heredity and environment, no better example could be found.

After his graduation, at which time he received highest honors in oratory, he was offered many excellent positions, but declining them, he accepted a teacher's position among his own people. With the inspiration of a Hooker T. Washington, he entered into his work with hearty enthusiasm, and with determination to lift his people to a higher plane.

His address before the National Council of Congregational churches at Boston in 1910 won a name for him far and wide. His address received the biggest ovation of any that was given.

He was secured for a lecture in Charlevoix through the kindness of Rev. Holden A. Putnam, who heard him at the Boston convention, and is now arranging series of lectures to be given by Mr. Pickens in Michigan. Mr. Pickens is not booked by any of the lecture bureaus and only by arranging for a special trip could we get him for Charlevoix.

Mr. Pickens is not only an orator, but is a man of national reputation, and will give the citizens of Charlevoix a treat on February 14, 1914.

At the close of Mr. Pickens' lecture, the committee will gladly refund the price of admission to any who feel that they did not get "value received."

"The Congregationalist and Christian World," Boston, Massachusetts, October 29, 1910, says: "Alabama may have more effective speakers than Prof. William Pickens former DeForest Prize man at Yale, but it is not easy for a northern man to name them. The reputation of this colored man is established with an A. M. A. audience, for he was greeted with cheers, and only the vigor of President Northrop rule, enforced by vigorous use of the gavel, silenced the demand of the audience for a recall."

In Honor of Lincoln.

The annual Lincoln banquet of the Charlevoix Historical society will be held at the Congregational church in the new dining room, on Friday evening, February 21, at 7 o'clock. Tickets will be on sale to members at F. E. Frazer's store until Monday evening, February 17. All remaining unsold at that time may be purchased by the general public. Tickets, 50c; limited to one hundred.

DUTIES ARE FULLY EXPLAINED

Of the Proposed Farm Expert Where Counties are Organized.

BY DIRECTOR CHAS. P. REED

Who Has Charge of Work in Eleventh Congressional District.

Expose to be Borne by the United States, Crop Improvement Committee and the County—Several Counties Organized.

Among the most important subjects brought up at the round-up farmers' institute was, what will be the duties of the proposed farm expert for counties. Mr. Reed, the supervisor for this district, being present and explaining the duties, in brief Mr. Reed told of the work as follows:

A farm expert is a trained agriculturist sent out by the United States department of agriculture who will spend five days of every week demonstrating on the farms of the county.

He will study the soils in every locality and spend his entire time in the interest of improved farming in this county. He will go to the farmers on their farms and aid and assist them.

He will study the methods of the farmers in preparing their land for seeding; the methods of cultivation; kinds of fertilizer; kinds of seeds; how the crop is gathered and marketed.

He will study the livestock and the methods of handling; wherever he goes he will give the farmers the practical benefit of the scientific work and knowledge. He will give them the benefit of the investigations conducted by the various experiment stations of the United States Department of Agriculture.

He will study market conditions, shipping facilities, means of transportation, etc. He will advise the farmers as a physician advises his patient. When he finds an ill he will try to cure it. He will work for the general improvement of financial, social and educational conditions on the farm.

He will assist the farmers' institutes, encourage the work of the grange, and work in harmony with all organizations which have for their object the betterment of conditions on the farm. He will work in the interest of the poorest as well as the richest farmers in Charlevoix county. He will carry the good practices from one farm to another.

D. S. Payton, who has been appointed to push the matter in this county, has received the following information in regard to the paying of the expert in the different counties from Professor Mumford who has charge of the work in this state:

The funds available for this work from the United States government for Michigan have been definitely appropriated for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, but it is hoped that under the new appropriation it may be possible to offer aid to more counties in Michigan after July 1. It has been the policy of the government, in so far as funds are available, to pay towards the salary of the agent at the rate of $100 per month. The amount required to pay the salary and expenses of the county agent varies from $2,400 to $3,000 per year.

Mr. Payton has also received the following from the Crop Improvement committee, which is self explanatory:

"The organization of a county farm bureau with a bona fide membership, said membership to be open to anyone in the county wishing to join, upon payment of the dues, which should be nominal. All forces in the county are urged to join, including farmers, bankers, merchants, lawyers, manufacturers, land owners, etc."

"The putting of the county agent under contract for at least two years."

"Possibly we may be able to contribute $1000 for your county. There are now enough counties about ready to more than use up our donation which is only available at present to the first 100 counties. (Continued on page 6.)"

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Honey Pot.

JOHN DUNMEADE had thought that antipathy would not defeat its sting. Not until the event, until Benton county, his own neighbors, had repudiated him could he measure the hurt. There was one thing which he would do—deep down within him was the unworded resolve that it should be his victory.

"There's something," he told Haig, a week after the primaries, "that has been haunting me."

And he told the other what Sheehan had said concerning the bank.

"Well, what business is it of yours? You aren't the guardian of the public morals. Even if you want to be, the people have just clearly declared that they don't. Keep out of what isn't your affair."

"But I'm still district attorney."

"All right. If anything happens or any one makes official information before the end of your term, prosecute."

"But I understand my duty to include uncovering crime as well as prosecuting it."

"I'll ask Blake to let me go over the books."

"He won't let you, of course. There'd be a crash."

"I think he will," said John thoughtfully. "If nothing is wrong. Especially when he understands that, if he doesn't, I'll subpoena him with the books before the grand jury. If there's nothing wrong, there will be no crash. But I have friends who have money and stock in the bank. And if our political bank history is repeating itself they and the public have the right to know it."

"John," Haig argued earnestly, "don't you do it. Haven't you had enough? What's the use of making more trouble and enemies for yourself?"

"I know," John said patiently. "I've gone over all that. This is my last crusade. But it goes through. Because, if there's anything amiss, now is the time for it to come out, while it can help Jerry Brent."

"Great Scott! Have you still faith in the people? Don't you know what they'll do, if you uncover anything? Just snuff daintily around and then walk off to vote for Sherrod or Jenkins or whoever the gauges nominate. I think it very possible that things aren't straight at the bank. But I like you and I like Warren Blake—he's a good friend of yours, too—and I don't want to see him in trouble. Besides," he grinned, "most of my money is deposited in the bank."

"Is that all you have to offer for the defense? If it is—are you coming along to help me or not?"

"I suppose," Haig grinned, "I'll have to. You need a guardian angel."

So it happened that at a critical time in the fortunes of the bank and its officers John and Haig set out on their mission. They chose an hour early in the evening, after supper. They tried the bank first. It would be closed, but within, as all New Chelsea knew, Warren Blake was apt to be found faithfully at the work that never seemed to end.

The dark green window shades had been closely pulled down, but a glimmering around the edges showed that a light was burning within. Blake might have been expecting them, so promptly was the door thrown open when they rapped. Surprise, however, was depicted on his face when he beheld the visitors.

"Good evening, gentlemen. Can I do something for you?"

"We'd like to have a little talk with you, Warren," said John. "It concerns the bank."

"The bank?"

Suddenly Warren by some strange intuition knew, as he had known that the market would say, what this untimely visit portended. He felt the blood leave his face and rush to his heart. His hands and feet became icy cold. He stared stupidly at the visitors, as though his faculties were benumbed.

"I'm pretty busy tonight," he said. "Can't you put it off until Monday?"

"I think we'd better talk it over now, Warren," John answered.

The sense of shock seemed to pass away. The cashier threw the door wider open to admit them. "Come in," he said quietly. They entered, and he closed and locked the door behind them. Then he straightened up, at composure to face them.

"I'll have to ask you to be brief. I'm preparing some papers for Senator Murchell and Mr. Hampden, and they'll be here soon."

"I'll come right to the point," John answered. "Warren, I want to see the books of the bank. I've heard that you are carrying a good deal of worth less political paper and that the bank is in danger. I want to verify or disprove that."

"That's absurd. The bank is perfectly safe. And, of course, we don't let you see the books. You aren't even a stockholder and have no interest in them."

"Warren," said Haig hastily, putting his hand on the cashier's shoulder, "I do as he asks. We're here in a friendly way. And, of course, the bank is sound. You can't imagine me and me to do anything to harm it."

You shook his head. "You ought to know that it is out of the question."

"Then," said John regretfully, "I'll have to subpoena you to appear with the books before the grand jury on Monday." He drew forth two documents, one of which he gave to Blake.

"I suggest that you wait and explain your errand to Murchell and Hampden. They will be here soon. Just take chairs in the cage. While we're waiting I'll finish my work," said Blake.

He ushered them into the cage, found chairs, offered cigars and, politely excusing himself, retired into the cashier's office and settled himself at the desk. For a few minutes he worked, with a speed that was not nervous haste, transcribing figures from a book before him and adding up columns. Then he wrote a few lines and carefully folded them.

This done, he seemed to have come to the end of his work. But he did not return to John and Haig. He seemed to have lost consciousness of their proximity. The pen fell from his fingers. His folded hands rested passively on the desk. He sat motionless, staring straight ahead into nothingness. Under the gaslight his face showed very white. A heavy, uneasy silence descended upon the three men.

There came a rap at the door.

As though he had been waiting for just that, Warren rose, went to the door and admitted the new visitors. They were Hampden and Murchell. Hampden was the first to notice the presence of John and Haig.

"What are they doing here?" he demanded suspiciously.

"Come back into the office and we'll explain," Warren answered. "You come, too," he nodded to the men with him in the cage.

The five men gathered in the little office. No one sat down or offered to shake hands. Warren broke the silence calmly.

"Dunmeade wants to examine the books."

"Well, he can't do it," Hampden said quickly.

"So I told him," Warren continued. "And he followed the request up by serving me with a subpoena to appear with the books before the grand jury."

"Why are you doing this?" Murchell demanded of John.

"Because I have information that the bank is carrying worthless political paper and is rotten. I have it from one who has helped manipulate such paper—from one, in fact, whose notes, supposed to be uncollectable, the bank is now trying to collect."

"And on general suspicion you would take an action that might ruin the soundest bank in the country?"

"Not on general suspicion," John returned. "But on absolute knowledge. There!" He pointed to Blake's face.

"And there!" Haig's dry, shrill voice was like the crack of a whip—as he aimed a long, lean forefinger at Hampden. The latter recoiled as from a blow.

Murchell did not look at Blake or Hampden. From under wrinkled brows his eyes were boring deep into John's, seeking to test the strength of the latter's determination. He saw only one way out; boldly he took it.

"You can see the books, now?"

"We may as well begin now. It will take some time, I suppose."

Hampden, vainly trying to regain an appearance of composure, tremblingly sat down. For a minute Warren said nothing. When he did speak it was in a low, lifeless voice.

"I can save you the trouble. The statement I have been preparing for Senator Murchell contains what you want, I think. This is it." He pointed to the papers lying on his desk.

Slowly, mechanically, as one walking in sleep, he gathered up the books on the desk and carried them from the office to the vault. John saw Warren put the books in their places, then found him around in a corner of the shelf. Warren seemed to feel his presence.

For an instant the body swayed. Then, hunched and resting on the shelf, he turned to face John. Then the hand grasping a black, shining thing, leaped from the shelf to his head. John's cry and the shot rang out together.

For an instant the body swayed, then crumpled in a heap on the floor.

Four stunned men, held in a horrible fascination, knelt by the ghastly thing, dumbly watching the struggle of that which is called life to free itself from its prison of flesh. Of these men, three of them, each in anguish, was calling himself murderer.

For nearly an hour—an eternity—shaken to the very center of their beings, they kept the death watch. There was a shiver that passed over the whole body—then stillness.

Haig was the first to recover himself. He caught John by the arm and drew him away. "Come back here!" He drew John into the office and forced him to sit down. "And you two come."

Murchell seemed to come out of his daze. He touched Hampden, who lowered him docilely and fell into a chair.

"I seem to be the only one with a trace of sanity left. And I," said Haig grimly, nipping his brow with a shaking hand. "I am pretty far gone. God I didn't know it could be so awful that we've got to decide whether we'll let this—how and why it happened—come out. By some miracle nobody seems to have heard. If the luck holds, we may be able to keep it quiet." He looked at Murchell.

But a great change seemed to have come over the politician during the racking hour. His face was ashen, he looked old as he never had before. All the firm self-reliance, the habit of domination, justified through so many crises, seemed to have broken down in the presence of sudden, violent death. He shook his head in a hopeless negative.

"There's no use trying," he said wearily. "If you go ahead with this investigation," he turned to John. "It's for you to decide. If this is kept quiet and you don't go on I can save the bank maybe. But if you do go on there'll be a great scandal and I can do nothing. And—you've got to understand the situation—you'll have to prosecute Hampden here."

John did not answer. He was staring at the face of Warren Blake.

Haig nodded his forehead again. "Let's get out of here," he muttered hoarsely. "I stay much longer with—then I'll be a gliding idiot."

He took the dead cashier's keys from the desk, turned out the light and went to the door. The others followed.

They forgot to close the vault. But it was well guarded.

New Chelsea had been long asleep. The streets emptied, when Haig and Murchell, accompanied by the doctor and undertaker—stockholders in the bank and frightened into secrecy—drove a roundabout course by side streets and alleys to the rear door of the bank. Like thieves, they entered and carried what lay there out to the carriage. Then they drove away, praying that no untimely passerby had chanced to observe them.

But the luck held.

Later still, with another picture—a little, faded old woman become in an instant a foolishly smiling child—buried into their memories, Haig and Murchell emerged from the home of Warren Blake. Haig stopped, looking up.

"I wonder what John Dunmeade is going through just now? I can see the end. The good have no luck. There's a curse on the man responsible for this night. Old man, do you say amen? You and I will have to discuss the matter of payment."

He caught the other by the shoulder, peered closely into his face and, laughing harshly, turned away.

Through a night that seemed endless a man fought a battle old as sin itself. He had sought the solitude of the field in a blind, vain wish to escape the issue and the thing that filled his eyes. He had come so near to greatness. And now, at an hour when he seemed most to need stimulus and support, he was brought face to face with the temptation to desert. It was one thing in a moment of disheartenment to cry, as he had cried to himself, "I have come to the end." It was far different when opportunity had come to revive a sinking cause to stay his hand. He knew he had but to reach out to his close, but an Excelsior rising out of the waters to lend irretrievably to him who would yield it, but a new proof for a calloused people, one fact the more to add to the knowledge, whose cumulative power in the end would—must—carry the people forward, upward.

It was Hampden, Katherine and John Dunmeade against the people.

And what did he owe the people, the calloused fools whose knowledge, if not complete, was yet full enough to show them whether they were going and whether they must turn, but who trudged contentedly on, indifferent to all but the present profit, thinking only of self, repudiating and sneering at those who offered honest service and counsel? The balance was all against them, and in his favor. Let some one else now take up the task to which John Dunmeade had been unequal!

He saw Stephen Hampden cowering a suddenly broken, fear palsied man before the death agony, looking with a kind of wildness on the dying man's face, as though in Warren Blake's example he saw a way out of the tangle. A troop of miserable, pale, able figures marched before him—Stanton, Brown, Parsons, Sheehan, Blake—men whom he had punished, whose lives he had shattered or taken in his crusade—what end? Their place had been taken by other men of the kind, the world no better, no wiser so far as he could see. Behind the troop marched a regiment of men and women, his neighbors, whose little savings would be lost, did the bank fail through his disclosures, but who were preserved if Murchell's promise

For Hair Health

If Rexall "93" Hair Tonic does not improve the health of your scalp and hair, we will pay for what you use during the trial.

We could not so strongly endorse Rexall "93" Hair Tonic and continue to sell it to the same people if it did not do all we claim. Should it not prove entirely satisfactory our customers would lose faith in us, we would lose their patronage, and our business would suffer.

If your hair is falling out or you suffer any scalp trouble, we believe Rexall "93" Hair Tonic will do more to eradicate the dandruff, give health to the scalp, stimulate new hair growth and prevent premature baldness than any other human agency.

We want you to make us prove this. We ask you to risk no money whatever. Buy a bottle of Rexall "93" Hair Tonic, use it according to directions for thirty days, then if you are not entirely satisfied, come and tell us and we will promptly hand back the money you paid us for it.

We won't ask you to sign anything, nor even to bring the bottle back. We won't obligate you in any way. We will take your mere word. Could anything be more fair? Could we do anything more to prove our belief in Rexall "93" Hair Tonic, and our honesty of purpose in recommending it to you?

Rexall "93" Hair Tonic is as pleasant to use as spring water and has a faint, pleasing odor. It comes in two sizes of bottles, 50c and $1.00. You can buy Rexall "93" Hair Tonic in this community only at our store:

ON THE INCREASE

Insanity is in State of Michigan According to Report of Secretary Murray.

Secretary Murray of the state board of corrections and charities, has prepared statistics that show a rapid increase in insanity in Michigan. The percentage of increase in the population of the various state asylums during the last 11 years has been 4.131, while the increase in population of the state has been but .1847 percentage. From 1904 to 1910 the increase in the asylums of the state has been .3083 per cent, while the increase in the state has been but .1108 per cent. The records show the population of the state for last year as 2,004,550 and the total number of patients confined in the six state asylums was 16,650. In 1909 the population of the state was 2,150,872 and the number of patients in the various asylums was 4,710. The number of patients confined in the Kalamazoo asylum in 1901 was 1,437; 1912, 2015; Pontiac, 1901, 1065; 1912, 1,391; Traverse City, 1901, 1,807; 1912, 1,389; Ionia, 1901, 283; 1912, 139, and Wayne county asylum, 1901, 101; 1912, 571.

TEST EYESIGHT

All Michigan School Children Are to Have Eyesight Tested Before Spring.

It is expected that the eyesight of every school child in the state of Michigan will be tested before spring. Superintendent of Public Instruction Luther L. Wright has had furnished to every teacher in commonwealth a proper eye-testing card with explicit instructions as to how to make tests of children.

In other states the percentage of children having defective eyesight has proved appalling. The tests in Michigan are given with a view to helping the teacher handle the child. Often the child is considered dull but it is due to the fact that the hearing or eyesight is defective and the teacher does not recognize this handicap. Sometimes by moving a child's seat nearer a window relieves a decided strain. It is expected that in quite a number of cases the condition of the eyesight will be found so bad as to warrant the services of an optician.

The teacher will then take the matter up with the parent, in this way making it possible for the child to become a better student. Those children whose eyesight is so defective that school work is impossible must under the compulsory law be sent to Lansing.

Thousands of stockholders, but there are only a few directors. The only interest that the stockholders have in the matter is the production of profits. Nearly all corporation business is of a kind which comparatively few people are qualified to carry on. The questions which arise are those which call for decision by experts. With the government of a city the case is different. Municipal government is not, as it is very frequently asserted to be, mere business. In the case of a corporation it makes little difference whether the stockholders receive training and management or not. In the case of municipal government it is of the very highest importance that as many men as possible should be interested in the matter and should receive training thereon. The interest of the citizen is immeasurably wider than the interest of the stockholder. The government of a city may be economically administered, and yet not be administered to the best interests of the citizenship generally. It appears, therefore, that mere efficiency can be secured at too high a cost, and that municipal government is the best which not only achieves the greatest results with the least expenditure and the least expense, but that which also meets the needs of the greatest number of people, stimulates the largest possible measure of interest in public affairs, and qualifies the largest possible number of citizens for the conduct of government of affairs.

3rd. It is also claimed that the commission form of government is beneficial because it makes the officials of the city responsible to the public alone. Our present form of government, it is said, makes officials responsible to political parties, rather than to the people generally. There is, undoubtedly, some measure of truth in this, and yet it may be said in answer that this condition is not inevitable, but is simply an abuse which may be destroyed without destroying the system under which it has flourished. And again, a political party is composed of citizens and the political party which elects its candidates to office does so only because it is able to command the votes of a majority, or at least a substantial plurality, of the citizens. As soon as it is unable to command such support, it necessarily loses power. Under the commission form of government, government by party is said to be abolished, but government by party is never abolished except in name. The issues which are presented under this form of government may not be presented under the old party names, but they will nevertheless be presented under some names. It is urged that under the commission form of government men will be elected simply for their efficiency, but this is probably not true. Candidates for public office will inevitably be identified with certain measures, and just as those who now believe in republican or democratic principles support candidates of their faith for public office, so under this proposed change candidates for public office will be supported by groups of voters who believe in the principles which they represent. The change, therefore, will be simply a change in name, and there are many who still think that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, and that there is nothing gained by a simple change of nomenclature which leaves conditions essentially as they were.

In conclusion, it is again urged that the commission form of government, because it entrusts larger functions to public officials and pays salaries commensurate with the services rendered, would attract to the public service a better type of men. But it may be urged in answer to that the finest public service is never the service which is rendered for pay, and that the reason that business men of the highest type do not now seek election to office is not because the power is small or the remuneration inadequate, but because they are engrossed in business, and their talents are so much more profitably employed to their private affairs. It seems that what we need in order to secure the services of the best men in the community in municipal government is not an increase of power or pay for public officials, but an increase of the sense of civic responsibility in the citizens.

Miss Evelyn Bargett is one of the best known entertainers in the lyceum work today. With her crayons, of different colors, Miss Bargett produces before her audience many landscapes which appear as beautiful as paintings, while her humorous drawings are as funny as the comic section of the Sunday paper. While her pictures are taking shape under her deft fingers, she charms her hearers with flashes of wit and humor. The company, besides Miss Bargett, comprises a violinist, a pianist and bass soloist.

Miss Isabelle Hullinger is the pianist with this company. The New York Musical Courier referring to her work, says: "She put into the work a breadth of style and brilliancy of technique which made her performance one of keen artistic pleasure."

Horace Victor Benjamin, baritone with the Bargett company, is possessor one of the finest voices before the public.

Miss Ethel Freeman, the violinist, has been before the lyceum public for many years, and has captivated many audiences.

MICHIGAN CROP REPORT

As Given Out by Secretary of State Martindale for Month of January.

In reply to the question, "Has wheat during January suffered in any way from any cause?" 150 correspondents in the southern counties answer "yes" and 118 "no"; in the central counties 73 answer "yes" and 52 "no"; in the northern counties 51 answer "yes" and 43 "no"; and in the Upper Peninsula 6 answer "yes" and 16 "no."

Snow protected wheat in the state 9 days, in the southern counties 7, in the central counties 9, in the northern counties 11 and in the Upper Peninsula 21 days.

The average depth of snow on January the 15th in the state was 1.51 inches, in the southern counties 1.12, in the central counties 1.20, in the northern counties 1.49 and in the Upper Peninsula 5.88 inches.

On January the 31st the average depth of snow in the state was 1.09 inches, in the southern counties 0.38, in the central counties 0.76 of an inch, in the northern counties 3.92 and in the Upper Peninsula 9.15 inches.

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in January at 97 flouring mills was 94,500 and at 75 elevators and to grain dealers 68,037, or a total of 162,537 bushels. Of this amount 108,588 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 43,336 in the central counties and 12,613 in the northern counties and Upper Peninsula. The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the six months, August January is 3,250,000. Eighty-nine mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in January. The average condition of live stock in the state is reported as follows, comparison being with stock in good, healthy and thrifty condition; horses and sheep 26, cattle and swine 95.

DAIRY MEETING

Will be held in the Court House Next Wednesday Afternoon February 19.

Arrangements have been made by the Blue Valley Creamery company of Grand Rapids, for a dairy meeting and institute program which will be held in the court house on Wednesday, February 19, at 2:30 p. m.

This is one of a large series of meetings which will be held in Michigan this year in the territory from which this company received its supply of cream.

G. T. Guthrie, manager of the Blue Valley Creamery company of Grand Rapids, formerly of the Iowa Agricultural college, will give a practical talk on the "Breeding and Feeding of Dairy Cattle," and an opportunity for general discussion will be given. Over one hundred and fifty seven lantern slides taken from actual photographs of dairies, will be used in illustrating the lecture, which prove not only of great value in demonstrating the different points in the lecture, but also in entertaining the audience.

Several series of comic slides will be shown for the amusement of the young folks.

These meetings are intended to supplement the work of the farmers' institute, in that, they are confined wholly to the subject of dairying. Their purpose is to encourage dairying and to help farmers get more money out of their cows. The great success of former meetings demonstrates that the farmers of Michigan are awake to the possibilities of the cow.

There are no charges in connection with the meeting and everybody is cordially invited to come and bring the family.

PASSED THE SENATE

Webb Bill Which Prevents Shipment of Liquors Into Dry States.

Monday the United States senate passed the Webb bill which prohibits the shipment of intoxicating liquors from one state to another to be received or sold in violation of the law of the state to which shipment is made.

The house has passed the bill with slight changes from the senate bill, in which they will probably concur and the measure will go to the president for signature.

THE SCHOOL AND THE COMMUNITY

Interesting Experiment at Colebrook Academy.

TRY "COMBINED EDUCATION."

New Hampshire Board of Education to Lay as Much Stress on Agriculture and Domestic Science as Language and Mathematics.

How can the high school best meet the needs of the community? The people of Colebrook, N. H., think they have solved the problem. Their experiment is interestingly described in a bulletin just issued for free distribution by the United States Bureau of Education.

Colebrook academy is located in a town of about 2,000 population in northern New Hampshire. Starting as a private school, it later became part of the public system of education. For years it has successfully done the work expected of a high school in the traditional branches of the New England school. Now it is trying to do something more. Without lowering its standards, without ceasing to furnish the training necessary for those going into the professions, it is endeavoring to provide an adequate education for the great mass of boys and girls who ought to remain and grow up with the country.

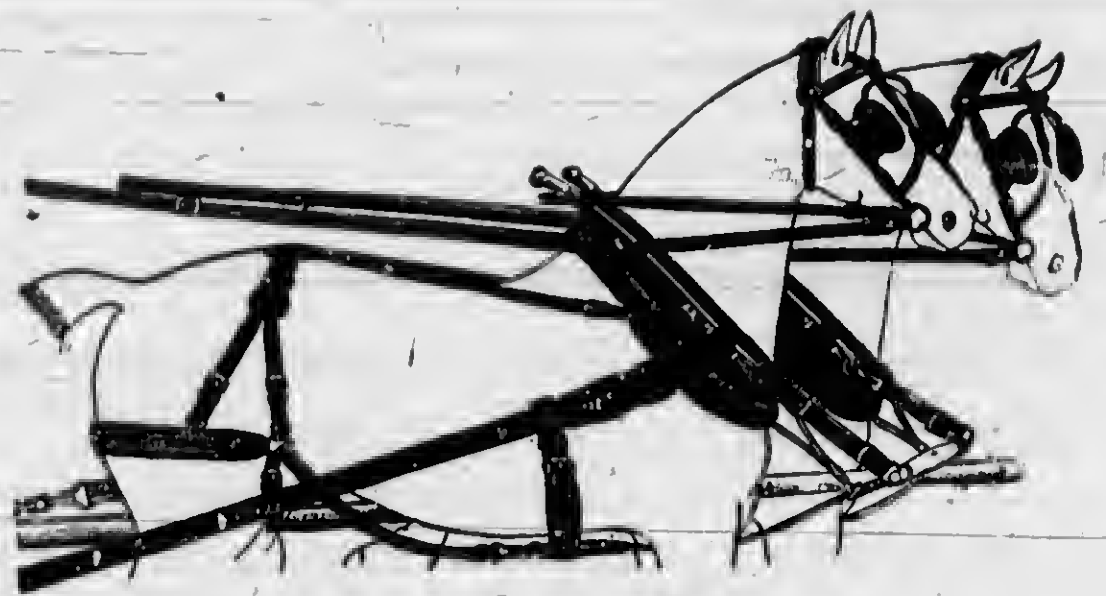

It is seeking, in other words, to readjust itself to the needs of the particular community in which it is. Just what this readjustment means may be seen from the following four significant additions to the school plant—the greenhouse, the dairy laboratory, the domestic arts department and the workshop, including a carpenter and blacksmith shop. Complete courses are given in agriculture and domestic science. Colebrook is the center of a rural district, and these are the vital interests of a large part of the population.

Colebrook academy does not propose to become a vocational school. It remains a general high school. The courses in agriculture and domestic science exist side by side with those of the traditional high school subjects, as well as the commercial branches.

"Its purpose is not primarily to make good farmers or skilled mechanics or professional housekeepers," says Hon. H. C. Morrison, state superintendent of New Hampshire. "The primary object is the education of the boy and girl to become a sincere and efficient and happy man and woman, capable of becoming an educated worker with material things, capable of getting life's happiness out of work rather than out of the leisure which comes after work if indeed it comes at all."

The significance of the Colebrook movement lies in the fact that it demonstrates the "basic" principle upon which the American high school must stand or fall: that it shall be a direct source of strength to the community that pays for it. The feeling exists that secondary rural schools leave many families weakened the communities which supported them; that by the very efficiency of their work they have trained young men and women for their fields of usefulness and have thus frequently deprived the community of the services of its best citizens. It is said that New Hampshire has been a notable sufferer from the process and that readjustment is necessary if the process is to be checked and the upbuilding of the country interests is to go on again.

Particularly important is the part to be played by the reconstructed rural high school in the country life movement. The Colebrook academy demonstrates the fundamental arts of agriculture and home making. Given a base of this type, with a program of study matching the real interests of the community, and rural civilization may be truth be made as efficient and satisfying as other civilizations.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST PLAN

Of Commission Form of Government Are Given This Week.

CONCLUSION OF ARTICLES

Executive and Legislative Functions of Government Should be Separated.

Power May be Concentrated in One Section of City Might Deprive Minority of Voice in Conduct of Affairs.

Last week we considered the principal of arguments which are urged in favor of the adoption of the commission form of government. This week we propose to consider some of the principal objections which are made to it, with the view of making it possible to determine where the balance of advantages lies—whether with the form of municipal government with which we are familiar, or with this new proposition.

It is objected, first, that the commission form of government combines executive and legislative functions in the same persons. Our various governments—national, state and municipal—are reformed on the same general principle, viz: that the various branches of the government should be distinct and should be administered by different persons. Thus, in the national and state governments, we have a clear distinction between the executive, legislative and judicial functions. We have been trained in the idea that the separation of these functions is for the best interest of the state, because, by the distribution of power, and the resulting checks and balances, hasty, unconsidered or oppressive action is less likely to be taken. Therefore we have followed the same principle in the conduct of municipal government, giving the power of legislation to the elected council, consisting of members representing the various parts of the city, and the executive function to a mayor or other officer elected by the people at large. It has been said that, whatever may be the reasons for preserving this distinction in our national and state governments, there is absolutely no reason for preventing it in the government of the city, since the civil and political rights of the citizens of the city are protected by state and national constitutional provisions. So far as the absolute rights of person and property and our historic civil and political rights are concerned, this may be true; yet on the other hand, when the enactment and execution of the laws are committed to the same hands, there is danger that there may not be that sobriety and restraint which go with the distribution of authority, and which have always been found to be essential to the highest good of the community. At any rate the objection to the combination of these functions in the same persons is one which cannot be dismissed with a smile, and should be thoroughly discussed by any community to which the commission form of government is submitted.

Second: it is objected that, under the commission form of government, the concentration of responsibility which is urged in its favor is not secured, since the appointments are made by a majority of the council instead of by a single executive; and this objection also is worthy of consideration. In the judgment of very many students of the municipal problem, the first results, so far as the location of responsibility is concerned, are secured by giving the unrestricted power of appointment to a single elected executive head, and leaving the legislative function in the hands of an elected council. Under this system, the responsibility for appointments, and for the conduct of their offices by the persons appointed, can be distinctly and unmistakably placed upon the appointing head, and because there is upon his power of appointment or removal, he is left without excuse for the conduct of those whose administration of their departments is absolutely within his control. But, under the commission form of government, if there are five members of the commission, then the power of appointment lies with a majority of three, and the responsibility, instead of being concentrated is distributed; opportunities are created for deals and trades by which temporary majorities in the commission may be constituted, and the responsibility is not definitely and conclusively fixed. This objection also is not technical but vital, and deserves fair and impartial consideration. And in this connection it is urged that the concentration of authority and the location of responsibility, which everyone admits is desirable, do not apply to the legislative branch of the government, but only to the executive. It is insisted that it is desirable from every point of view that the legislative department of the city government should be made up of a considerable number of men, representing the various geographical divisions and political elements of the community. Under the commission form of government the elected officials may come from one section of the city or from one element of the community, and, therefore, in their deliberations many elements in the community may not be represented at all. It seems reasonable to assert that a form of government which concentrates administrative responsibility in a single elected official, and gives legislative authority to a fairly numerous body of men representative of the city at large, is far more desirable from every point of view than government by commission, by which neither of these results might be realized.

The objection is also made that the commission form of government may operate to deprive the minority of the people of the city of any voice in the conduct of its affairs. It cannot be disputed that there is a real danger along this line. To use our own city as an illustration: It can be seen how easy it would be, if we should adopt the commission form of government and entrust the legislative and executive departments of that government to—say—three commissioners for the predominating element in the community to elect all and discharge three of the commissioners, and leave the rest of the community without any representation or voice in the government of the city; and this would be a deplorable result from any point of view. It might under certain circumstances result in the cultivation of unrest and dissatisfaction on the part of

FLAMES THREATEN CLARION VILLAGE

Store and Dwelling are Burned to the Ground Last Thursday.

Effective Work of Volunteers Prevent Further Disaster—Loss About $2,500.

Clarion experienced one of the most disastrous fires in its history Thursday noon, when David Geyer's general store and almost the entire contents, as well as a dwelling house a short distance away, occupied by W. O. Wheeler and family and owned by Mrs. Walter Parker, of Petoskey, were consumed by flames which found their origin about the chimney of the store. The aggregate loss, it is roughly estimated, will reach $2,500.

A stiff breeze threatened to spread the flames to the entire village, but the almost superhuman efforts of the men who fought the conflagration at last won out and saved the community.

The efforts to save the contents of the Geyer store resulted in the preservation of only about thirty dollars' worth of stock. The loss on this building alone and contents is estimated at $1,200. Shoe stock amounting to six hundred dollars was consumed by the flames. The contents of the dwelling house were saved by diligent work, but the building, probably valued at three hundred dollars, was razed by the fire.

A large force of volunteer fire fighters was on hand, and by liberal use of water saved the Geyer dwelling and the Crago store, the latter being in close proximity to the fire. It is not yet known what part of the loss is covered by insurance.

WESTERN MICHIGAN APPLE AND LAND SHOW IN PITTSBURG

The Western Michigan Development Bureau made its thirteenth big exhibit of the orchard and farm products of its territory in Pittsburg in January of this year. The display included 25 boxes of fancy apples of 27 different varieties and 50 boxes of fancy potatoes, in addition to samples of grain of the straw and processed from the branch in large glass jars. Better than upon people visited the exhibit, which lasted for a week, inspected the products shown, and asked questions about the Western Michigan county and its farm crops. Nearly 4000 copies of the illustrated magazine, "Western Michigan, Fruit With Flavor," were presented to persons who showed in more than a passing interest in the display. Many in the Pittsburg produce dealers visited the exhibition and made inquiries regarding the products grown in Western Michigan and the facilities for getting these products to the Pittsburg market. In connection with the displays, the illustrated lecture, "Western Michigan, the Land of Fruit and Fortune," was given daily.

SNOW BOUND IN THE ROCKIES

Robert Jarvis Writes Interesting Letter Relating His Experience.

SNOW CLAD PEAKS OF IDAHO

Iron Stead Made Desperate Efforts But
All Was in Vain.

Grab Got to be a Serious Question, But Was Solved—Letter Will be Continued in Next Issue.

One's experiences are never quite complete until they have endured the sensation of being snow bound in the hills of Idaho.

Our organization had been appearing in a wee village called Soldier. And perfect in application is the title. Soldier stands guard on a prairie about six thousand feet in elevation. On this particular occasion it was four feet under snow and a lonesome, uninteresting destination. But at night the curious pleasure seekers appeared in groups from out the blanket of velvety blackness and assembled at the "Tower Hall" to see us in person. A good attendance was naturally what we desired and as the hall was filled to capacity we felt well rewarded for our adventure.

We arose 6:30 a. m. Thursday to leave on the 8:30 train, the weather about twenty degrees below zero. There was an unusual amount of switching to be done which delayed our departure. But by 9:30 the mixed train was ready. It was a queer looking outfit. Locomotive 611 was nothing more than a hunch of iron conjured up to resemble a railway horse. The clanking machine coughed and wheezed as it staggered down the rails, displaying terrible agony and it was forcefully brought to one's attention that it would soon be laid away "sleeping the sleep that knows no waking" in the bone yard. Strung out behind this suffering servant of the Short Line were about ten of the most distorted box cars conceivable, three workmen cars and our own poor excuse of a car building—the passenger coach. But it was not all passenger coach, half partitioned off to accommodate the passengers, the other half reserved for baggage and the crew.

The signal to start was thrown, the engineer who pined the poor suffering slave somewhere inside its cab and setting forth a screech that would have made Gibraltar shudder, it trembled, moaned, gasped, sneezed and suddenly lurched

both to escape its tormentor. The couplings tightened their grip and the wayward supporters of the railroad snapped in their seats and groped about for something to cling to. Clumsily we squeaked our way out on the snow covered prairie. We tumbled down the track some eight or ten miles when suddenly we came to a stop. The business end of the train had shoved its nose into a snow bank that was too much to force aside and there she stood buzzing her wheels at a tremendous rate trying to push its nose still farther in the drift. Finally the crews of men from the three work cars were summoned to duty and in a short time sufficient snow was shoveled away so that we could crawl out.

We hadn't advanced but a short distance when we encountered a drift. This time it was decided to cut the pulling machine loose from the cars and let her buck the snow. On such a gallant piece of work, she bucked and snuck and bucked and stuck for about five miles when she was driven in until she couldn't move and the snow had fallen in behind to such an extent that it made it impossible to retreat and leave the poor thing lay. By this time she was well nigh exhausted and began to crack. She must have water. The nearest tank being some miles distant, snow was shoveled into her boiler to try and keep her alive. But it was useless to proceed. [Continued on page 8]

GREAT DAY FOR PYTHIANS

Northern Michigan Pythian League Will Meet in This City March 11.

Contest for Silver Cup by Expert Degree Teams—
Other Interesting Events Scheduled.

Tuesday, March 11, will be a big day in the history of Charlevoix Pythians. The above date has been fixed for the meeting of the Northern Michigan Pythian League and members from all over the northern part of the state will be present. The big event of the meeting will be the contest by expert degree teams for the silver cup now held by Manistee. Seven teams have already entered and the Grand Chancellor and other grand officers will officiate as judges.

Of equal interest to the visitors will be the amplification of the rank of page someone during the contest by Pine Lake lodge for the exhibition of the visiting brothers. This work was adopted by the supreme lodge at its last session and this will be the first time it has ever been given in the domain of Michigan.

WILL INCREASE HIS BUSINESS

A. E. Mason Will Open Dry Goods Department in Masonic Block.

Will Have Largest and Most Complete Department Store in Charlevoix.

About April 1, A. E. Mason, the pioneer grocer and shoemaker, will open a dry goods department in the corner room of the new Masonic Temple.

With this increase to his already large store, Mr. Mason will have the largest department store in the city, and something which Charlevoix has needed—an up-to-date department store. The city is to be congratulated on the business enterprise of Mr. Mason, who is one of our oldest and most reliable business men, in filling the want, and with the well-established reputation of Mason's store, success is assured for the new venture from the start.

NEW FURNITURE STORE

W. F. Graham Will Open New Business House in This City About March 1.

W. F. Graham will open a new furniture store about March 1 in the "Avenue" block, formerly occupied by Follen's store. It is his intention to carry a full and complete line of furniture, carrying only the best lines.

Mr. Graham is an old resident of this city, where he has followed the occupation of carpentry and undoubtedly will meet with success in his new vocation.

NOTICE.

BEST EVER HELD IN THE COUNTY

Was The Teachers' Institute Held in This City The First of Last Week.

PROF. LAIRD AND DR. HESS

Gave Very Instructive and Interesting Addresses at the Sessions.

Much Interest Shown in Educational Building on Fair Grounds—Equal Suffrage and Free Text Books Indorsed.

The teachers' institute which was held in Charlevoix, February 10-11, was one of the best meetings of its kind that has ever been held in the county. The meeting was called to order promptly at 10:00 Monday morning with Dr. Hess and Prof. Laird and about 80 teachers on hand and ready for action and from that time until the meeting closed to allow the instructors to catch their train there was something doing every minute.

Prof. Laird took up a line of discussion in which he reviewed the life of the child from a mental, moral and physiological condition. He gave an extensive review of the cause and effect of the many attitudes of the child and the effect and proffered excuse for many of the mistakes made by the teachers in the development of the child.

He was master of the situation at all times and the teachers listened with intense interest to this great man who has made a life study of this subject and his talks certainly paved the way to a better understanding of many of the perplexing problems of the teachers of the county in the managing of the developing child in his various stages and varying moods.

Dr. Hess took up a line of historical discussion that was certainly unique and he convinced his hearers that in the matter of history he was few equals. He proved the fallacy of the old fashioned method of memory teaching of this subject and the practical value of teaching a series of related facts in regard to historical truths. His illustrations of the value of the method was entertaining as well as convincing.

He first gave a list of ten words in no way related and asked the teachers to name them and said that he was not surprised that they were unable to do so. He later gave a list of fifty words each in turn related to and calculated to call the next one to mind, such as boy, kite, wind, storm, etc., the list in its turn covering many subjects, each in its turn related to the other and giving the list, took up a discussion of the subject of government. At the end of a half hour discussion he again turned to the list of words given and the teachers were able to give the entire list of words and to their own surprise could begin at either end of the list and give them.

His character study, using incidents in the life of Horace Mann was well worth the effort made by any teacher to attend the meeting.

The evening session was in the form of a banquet in the parlors of the Congregational church where a delightful supper was served to 115 teachers and citizens.

Prof. Laird and Dr. Hess each gave an excellent address. Prof. Laird taking for his theme, "The Other Side," Dr. Hess following with an address which might have been styled, "What is Success," though he named no definite title. No one who listened to those stirring addresses could feel a new interest in their fellowman.

A pleasing incident took place during the time that the commissioner took to urge upon the teachers the necessity that the teachers co-operate in the matter of securing an educational building on the fair grounds.

The commissioner asked the question: How many of the schools are taking an interest in this matter? Ernest Peaslee of the Three Bells school in Beebe township arose and said: "Our school is taking an interest in this matter and we are here to deliver the goods." He stepped forward and handed the commissioner a note which read as follows:

Tuesday last about twenty teachers, who had been attending the teachers' institute, and other passengers going on the south bound train were very unfortunate. A broken engine on track a mile south of the Saints camping grounds prevented them from going farther, so they had to stay until midnight or go home in the snow plow caboose. Of course they chose the latter.

Conductor S. L. Miller, Norfolk, Neb., on Honester Division of C. & N. W. Ry. Co., recommends Foley Kidney Pills and says: "I have used Foley Kidney Pills with very satisfactory results and endorse their use for any afflicted with kidney trouble. They are all right." Ivy Drug Store.—Adv

Coming Back To PETOSKEY United Doctors Specialist

will again be at the CUSHMAN HOUSE SATURDAY March 8th, 1913

ONE DAY ONLY. Hours 10 a. m. to 5 p. m.

Remarkable Success of these United Physicians in the Treatment of Chronic Diseases.

Only their Services Free of Charge for Positively the Last Time.

The United Doctors, licensed by the state of Michigan for the treatment of deformities and all nervous and chronic diseases of men, women and children, offer to all who call on this trip, consultation, examination, advice free, making no charge whatever, except the actual cost of medicine. All that is asked in return for these valuable services is that every person treated will state the result obtained to their friends and thus prove to the sick and afflicted in every city and locality, that at last treatments have been discovered that are reasonably sure and certain in their effect.

These doctors are considered by many former patients among America's leading specialists and nerve specialists and are experts in the treatment of chronic diseases and so great and wonderful have been their results that in many cases it is hard indeed to find the dividing line between skill and miracle. Diseases of the stomach, intestines, liver, blood, skin, nerves, heart, spleen, kidneys or bladder, rheumatism, sciatica, diabetes, bed-wetting, leg ulcers, weak lungs and those afflicted with long-standing, deep-seated chronic diseases that have baffled the skill of the family physician, should not fail to call.

According to their system no more operations for appendicitis, gall stones, tumors, gonorrhea, piles, etc. By their method these diseases are treated without operation or hypodermic injection.

They were among the first in America to earn the name of "Bloodless Surgeons," by doing away with the knife, with blood and with all pain in the successful treatment of these dangerous diseases.

If you have kidney or bladder troubles bring a two ounce bottle of your urine for chemical analysis and microscopic examination. Do not let these diseases be treated without operation or hypodermic injection.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

The W. C. T. U. program in charge of Miss Haines at the home of Mrs. A. E. Mason last week was much enjoyed. It was a commemorative service for Francis E. Willard and so the roll call consisted of quotations from Miss Willard's addresses. These had been selected by Miss Annie Metcalf, and since the date was Valentine's day, Miss Metcalf had written the quotations on heart-shaped cards tied with white ribbon. Mrs. A. M. Wilkinson sang very beautifully "Lead, Kindly Light," one of Miss Willard's favorite hymns. Little Dora Martin gave with expression and feeling, rare in one so young, an account of the life and work of Miss Willard. Five boys, Tommie Nowland, Verle Crandall, George Beaman, Chas. Webster and Willie Hampton—delivered extracts from Congressman R. P. Hobson's address in the House of Representatives recently in which he charges the liquor traffic with being "The Great Destroyer." Two eighth grade boys, Allen Arnold and John Walker, had made a large map of Michigan showing the dry counties as white and the wet ones black. They explained also the steps that had been taken in gaining the dry territory and pointed out the counties in which local option would be held this spring. Following this the county Normal class sang "We'll Make the Map all White" and then the young people with John Walker as leader.

Michigan, Michigan, Michigan free! Michigan white on the map must be. The dry is east, we mean business you see, And Michigan white on the map must be.

Saloons must go, they're preparing to flee, And Michigan white on the map must be.

The program closed with all joining in singing "Blest be the tie that binds," another one of Miss Willard's favorite hymns. Delicious candy had been prepared by Mrs. J. R. Cooper and was served at the close of the program.

Health Warning.

HIS RISE TO POWER

By Henry Russell Miller.
Author of
"The Man Higher Up"

Copyright, 1911, by the Bobbs-Merrill Company

Halz seated himself on the table, the homely, cadaverous features lighting up in a sardonic grin. "Now the funny part of it is, you aren't sure whether I'm bluffing or not. Let me assure you, I am not. We're a pretty triangle, each with the drop on the man in front of him. You hold over Dunmeade's head the fact of Hamper's disgrace, he gets me with his friendship and I can bring you down with my knowledge of this bank business. I'd hate to lose Dunmeade's regard by confronting him with the necessity of prosecuting his lady love's father. But, by the Lord! I'm not afraid to fire first. And I think you believe that."

Murchell did not answer. He was making a strong effort to control his rising irritation. But he listened intently because he did not know Halz well enough to decide whether the latter was really dangerous.

"You think my motive is lacking perhaps?" Halz inquired coolly. "Do you remember Wrenn—George Wrenn of Charlevoix—or have there been so many Wrenns that you can't keep track of them? Let me tell you his story. He was a preacher—not a very strong man, but a fine, big, clean hearted fellow—something like John Dunmeade—who believed in his fellowmen and loved them, the kind that would sit up all night with sick poor, suffering wretches or share his last dollar with those who needed it less than he did. Everybody loved him. He married a widow who had one son. He was a good husband and a perfect father to that boy. I know, because I was the boy. They had a reform convet in Charlevoix and sent Wrenn to the legislature. That was the year you almost failed of reelection to the senate. It cost you a million and a quarter to win, you may remember. There was a point where you needed just one vote, and four deacons got after Wrenn. He held out for awhile, but—Oh, you know how it works. He was poor, there was more money in sight than he had ever heard of, and they found his price—at $17,000. And he was cheap, too, comparatively. I think he must have been temporarily out of his mind, for he didn't really care for money. He went home a shame broken man. They couldn't prove it on him, but everybody knew he had taken money. They turned against him, his wife died broken hearted, and he had to leave Charlevoix. The money was soon spent, that kind never lasts. He went down hill fast and finally, a miserable, drunken wretch, he put a bullet through his head. I saw him do it—just as Warren Blake did it. So you can cut still another notch in your gun—eight on the list now, Brighton!"

"Quit that!" Halz roared. "I believe he has a conscience, after all! Can you sleep at night, Senator Murchell?" Murchell got slowly to his feet. In his eyes a light so terrible that even Halz for a moment was startled. White heat consumed quickly. The dumb passion soon burned itself out. The rigid pose melted into one of utter weariness.

"He wouldn't take it—at my hands." The arrogant habit of a lifetime had ceased to protest.

"Dunmeade? Oh, that's a problem in psychology. I think he will. In fact I know it, since I came here with full power of attorney from him. With me like Dunmeade the first compromise is the crucial one. As to means, you will find him more tractable, I fancy. My own opinion is he will be a more useful man for it. He won't be very happy at first, though. I'll be saying good night."

He took a few steps toward the door, then stopped, hesitating. He turned back. His insolent, overbearing manner fell from him.

"Senator," he said quietly, "I may have overdone it—Wrenn, Blake, all those fellows aren't worth a quail. Dunmeade is!"

But Murchell was not listening. He had forgotten Halz. He was watching the second birth of a young man who once had been.

Not the next day, nor the next, but on the third, the travel ended. William Murchell emerged from his brief, mysterious retirement to place himself at the head of his clamorous troops. It has been said that the campaign which followed was the most brilliant of his career.

CHAPTER XX. The Big Life.

One day John Dunmeade stood before the people of his state a lonely figure, almost forgotten amid the tumult of discussion that raged over the respective merits of Sherrod and Jenkins. On the next a few heads turned questioningly toward him, a few newspapers began darkly to hint that his candidacy might be more formidable than had been supposed. The exigencies of the party case, it seemed, demanded that Jerry Brent be met with a candidate of equal or greater fitness, and neither Jenkins nor Sherrod was utterly palatable to the people. Other molders of opinion followed suit. Soon a small host of them were shrieking that John Dunmeade must be nominated. The times required it, the people demanded it, no one else could beat Jerry Brent. In short, if these members of the press were to be believed, the party was in danger of defeat and had experienced a timely conviction of sin. Within a few days half the newspapers of the state were loudly trumpeting that Dunmeade's services to his party must be rewarded; the other half laboriously denying that service had been rendered and sneeringly pointing to the late primaries in Benton county as evidence of his popular weakness.

No one suspected a promoter. The people, so insistently told that they demanded the choice of the young reformer, began to believe it. A surprising number suddenly discovered that they "had always been for Dunmeade anyway," they were exceedingly proud of the fact. The thing was contagious. Gradual, but swift as the rising tide, it swept over the state, a flood of enthusiasm. Part of it was genuine. Far down in their hearts, beneath the "enlivened crust, the moral sluggishness that haled change, lay a germinating civic consciousness implanted by the very man who had become a hero overnight. The politicians—all but a few—were astounded. Supporters of Jenkins and Sherrod alike were profoundly alarmed.

Two days before the convention the Hon. G. Washington Jenkins bowed to the storm.

"I yield," he said, "to a spontaneous demand of the people."

"Sentiment," declared Murchell solemnly, "has crystallized. Dunmeade's the man." He explained that this decision had been reached by him in view of the evident wish of the people, and he added truthfully that he had not seen nor discussed the approaching convention with John Dunmeade. The Murchell men in the organization whooped with delight.

The day before the convention the delegates began to gather at the capital. In parlor A of the State hotel sat Murchell and in parlor B of the Loch-amer set Sherrod, playing against each other for votes. Between them fluted the delegates and those who had delegates to sell, like hungry summer flies. But they found—the little fellows at least—no honey pot at Murchell's end; no searchlight must mark the nomination of Dunmeade. (As for the captains of tens and hundreds of hundreds, that is another matter, into which we may not intrude.)

In crowded streets and sweltering, smoke clouded lobbies excitement ran high. The Dunmeade rallying ground, the only quiet spot in the capital, contrasted significantly with the nervous atmosphere of the Sherrod headquarters. Such contentment with the situation could not be feigned! It was infectious! It spread out among the delegates who had pledged themselves to vote for Dunmeade and nullified the frantic efforts of Parrott (nominally managing Sherrod's campaign) to start a stampede; it kept the neutrals wavering.

And over the scene of conflict hovered a formless one, unseen, unheard, unfelt, as spirits always are, waiting but for the critical moment to swoop down and decide the issue.

Came a bill in the battle, an hour toward morning, when the delegates had retired to allotted rooms or halves of beds or, more often, to some fortune over some table of chance, when the reckless lobbies were depopulated and the headquarters of the generals were deserted by all but their respective staffs and the yawning reporters.

There was a knock on Murchell's door and Greene, leader in Plumville, admitted a messenger, him who once before had lured Murchell from his retreat on an errand, if not of mercy, at least of salvation. Palmer went to him and whispered his message. Murchell shook his head.

"Tell him," he said aloud, "if he wants to see me he'll have to come here."

Palmer whispered a protest.

"Tell him," Murchell cut him short. "John Heath will meet him here."

The messenger started, looked hastily around at the others and grinned in sickly fashion. But he departed immediately, leaving the men in the room to wonder what charm lay in the unfamiliar name of John Heath.

In less than five minutes, rumor out running the fact, the hotel was alive. Sherrod had asked for a conference with Murchell.

Murchell men smiled triumphantly when they saw Parrott and Sherrod, wearing an air of confidence not wholly convincing, emerge from the elevator and make their way along the corridor to parlor A.

Sherrod and Parrott entered, carefully closing the door behind them, to the intense disappointment of the delegates outside. Parrott went jauntily up to Murchell and shook hands.

"Well," he grinned, "we've been having a blue little shindy, eh? This for the reporters."

"Glad," grinned Murchell, "you're enjoying it." There was a laugh, in which Parrott did not join.

The senator waved his hand, and at that moment Greene left the room, reluctant but obedient.

"See here," said Sherrod. "Can't we get together? You've got to admit that we've got you beaten."

"If you think the delegates you've been trying to win are mistaken, Sherrod, I've sold you more than fifty myself."

"I don't believe it," snapped Sherrod. "Quit bluffing and get down to cases. You know you can't beat us in the convention. You aren't trying to—You started all this racket over Dunmeade just to work up a sentiment that will make it harder for me to beat Brent. You're so anxious to get even," he exclaimed bitterly, "that you don't see you're in danger of stirring up a rebellion. What will you take to quit?"

"The revolution has started, Sherrod. And you'll never beat Brent."

"Won't it? We'll attend to that when the time comes."

"Because," Murchell continued calmly, "you won't be nominated." He turned to the governor. "Parrott, how much have you paid Sherrod to support you for senator?"

"Nothing," lied Parrott, albeit with evident uneasiness.

"Then you're lucky," Murchell commented. "Dan Hasland paid him $200,000 for the same promise."

"That's a lie," Sherrod declared hotly.

"Greene," commanded Murchell, "call Hasland in, will you? He's in the room next to mine. That is, if Parrott and Sherrod think it necessary?" He turned inquiringly toward them.

"I guess," Sherrod growled, "Parrott knows I'll not go back on him."

"Does he?" Murchell inquired dryly. "Look at him!"

And, indeed, Parrott's face just then showed anything but implicit confidence in the good faith of his leader.

"You needn't go, Greene. And, Murchell added, "I may announce right here that Hasland will succeed me as senator."

"Doesn't that depend," sneered Sherrod, "on who controls the legislature?"

"We'll control it."

Greene could have hugged himself, with delight as he saw Parrott visibly perturbed and Sherrod struggling to repress the rising, passionate hate and fear of the man before him. Greene had been a gambler and he felt a profound reverence for the man whose nerve in so big a game showed no tremor.

A long pause was broken by Parrott's anxious, "Senator, what have you got up your sleeve?"

"Sherrod's withdrawal."

"Who is going to make me withdraw?" Sherrod sneered again.

"Didn't Palmer give you my message, John Heath?"

"Who," demanded Parrott, "is John Heath?"

Murchell pointed to Sherrod's face which had suddenly turned pale. "He is a gentleman of whom Sherrod is very much afraid. Parrott, did you ever hear why I came to the capital last March? I came because I heard Sherrod here was drunk and threatening to throw himself into the river. I found out why—he had embezzled $500,000 of state moneys. We fixed the matter up temporarily."

He paused, stretched up in his chair, eyed Sherrod for a moment and went on quietly: "If your name goes before the convention, I will take the door and tell all about that transaction. I don't think you will be nominated. And, if you are, I'm quite sure you won't be elected. Do you withdraw?"

"I do not!"

"Very well," Murchell rose to indicate that the conference was at an end. "Come on, Parrott," Sherrod wheeled and marched toward the door. But Parrott did not follow. Instead, he dropped weakly into a chair, his glance shifting uncertainly from Murchell to the departing Sherrod and back again. Sherrod's hand was already on the doorknob when he noticed Parrott's defection. He stopped, looking back.

"Come along," he repeated firmly.

"I think," said Parrott slowly, "I'll stay here. I've had one cold brick too many."

"What?" Sherrod turned sharply and strode over to the vacillating governor. "You look! Seared by a cheap bluff like that! Do you think he means it? He doesn't use it! Here, I'll prove it to you!" He whirled to face Murchell, pointing. "There is the door. But Murchell, and on the other side of it a half dozen reporters. Don't wait for look at him. Their eyes were riveted on Sherrod, upon whose face had fallen a look of unbelieving wonderment. The wonderment became fear. Beads of sweat stood out on his forehead. He shook visibly. The defiant attitude suddenly dissolved.

"Perhaps," said Murchell grimly, "Mr. Sherrod would prefer to make this statement himself."

There was an instant of painful silence. Sherrod's mouth worked as though he were trying to speak. But no sound fell.

Parrott came to his relief. "Gentlemen," he said solemnly, "Mr. Sherrod has withdrawn his candidacy."

"In favor of Dunmeade," supplied Murchell.

The reporters looked inquiringly at Senator Murchell.

He nodded. "That's the statement." Without a single backward glance he went out of the room. Greene and the reporters followed him, leaving Sherrod and Parrott alone to get what comfort they could out of their plight and to settle certain accounts, a scene upon which we considerably draw the curtain.

A man around whom a battle had been fought leaped on a rail fence, gazing off at the unrelenting line where the azure of sky curved down to meet the green of hills. He had been there most of the afternoon, in flight from the kindly but obtrusive interest of his neighbors.

those who were thus deprived of their rightful influence in the community affairs, or it might simply result in an increased difference on the part of such people; and experience has shown that indifference is often far more hurtful to the interests of good government than dissatisfaction and unrest. There is good reason for feeling that, before the commission form of government is adopted, if it should be adopted, there should be some provision by which the various elements of the community might be enabled to secure their proportionate representation in the government of the city.

The purpose of this presentation of the arguments for and against the commission form of government has been simply to present them fairly, and to show that the argument is not yet closed. There is a disposition in certain quarters to consider the value of the commission form of government as a determined fact, but it is absurd to assume that twelve years, which is an insignificant period in the history of government, is sufficient to demonstrate beyond question the value of any governmental theory. It is, however, the opinion of the writer that the adoption of the commission form of government, with out some provision against the objections which have been pointed out in this article, would be unwise; and it is his judgment, as the result of a number of years of study of the municipal problem, that the best plan of municipal government includes, as its two cardinal features, two elements which have heretofore been pointed out and to which the commission plan does not provide: First, the election of a single executive, with unrestricted powers of appointment and discharge of every administrative official of the city; and second, the choice of a fairly large and representative legislative body, through which the opinions of the citizenship at large may find expression in municipal legislation. By securing these two elements in the government of our cities, it is probable a very long step would be taken toward the working of a satisfactory and effective form of municipal government.

Notice to Electors.

I take this method of announcing that I am a candidate for nomination on the Republican ticket for County Road Commissioner for the term of two years.

As to my qualification for the office I have served as street commissioner of the city of Charlevoix, during which time was constituted what is considered one of the best roads in the county. Besides I have had several years experience in practical road work.

Your support will be appreciated.

The Blue Ticket

It Brought a Rich
Reward

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Jink Prole, galloping in from the Twin Star ranch, halted his horse in front of the Red Spider Opera House and mopped his heated brow as he read the announcement on the tinboard.

"I'll be darned," he ejaculated, with a supplement of verbal pyrotechnics calculated to scorch the offending bill poster. A soft little voice whistled him around in the saddle to stare down at a pale, pretty little girl who was watching him with anxious blue eyes.

"Hello there, little gal! Jest you keep from under this here critter's heels," warned Jink, pulling his horse away from the child's vicinity. "Now, there! What was it you was asking,

"YOU ARE THE BEST MAN I EVER SAW."

eh?" His lean, brown face softened wonderfully as he bent down to catch her answer.

"I heard you swearing, mister. Is it because you don't like the play to night?"

"Why, I dunno, little gal. I liked it well enough, the first time I seen it, but somehow after you've seen the same play mangled some seventeen times, not to mention shootin' up one or two specially bad, rank companies, it look almost too familiar to me. Most like gettin' a bill, sayin', 'Please, rent, when you've broke yourself payin' it the week before.'"

"The sorry," said the child, with a little tired smile. "That's what everybody says. I wish Mr. Bemis had picked out some other play that folks would want to come and see."

"Who's Mr. Bemis?" demanded Jink Prole, with sudden suspicion.

"He's the manager of the company. He plays Lawyer Marks. I'm Little Eva," she explained proudly.

"Ho, ho!" Jink blinked rapidly. "So you're Little Eva, eh? Well, I reckon you'll make a right pretty one too. Where's your ma, Eva?"

"She's in there getting ready for the parade—Mother's Eliza."

Jink threw one spurred boot over the pommel of his saddle and rested his chin in his gloved hand. "Where's your dad? He playing Uncle Tom, eh?"

"Oh, no, father's dead. There's just us two, and mother lones it all, but we have to work to take care of each other, you see. The last town we were in the cowboys shot holes in the scenery and broke all the windows in the opera house, so we didn't make any money at all. I—I hope they won't do it here."

"Little Eva," declared Jink solemnly. "If any varmint so much as breathes out loud in that opera house tonight I'll shoot him as full of holes as a pepper pot! Now, don't you worry, honey. Jest you tell me where I can buy some tickets. I've got a pocket full of money to spend."

"Oh, you are the best man I ever saw," cried Little Eva, jumping up and down with excitement. "Now, I wonder you must do just as I say, will you?"

"Sure thing."

"Well, you can buy just as many tickets as you please, but the one you go in on yourself is to be a complimentary one from me—see? Special, because I like you and you are so kind and brown." She opened a little bag that swung from her waist and extracted a piece of blue pasteboard. With a bit of pencil she wrote some thing. "If you'll tell me your name," she suggested, "I might put that on too."

So Jink blushing received his complimentary ticket entitling him to witness one performance of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" free of charge. "That's a mighty pretty ticket, Eva," he said, tucking it away in his pocket. "I'm much obliged to you, and I shall be with 'em, 'cause you told her up to be to the best of it. I don't you forget." Now, how does that one of them look like?"

"Eh? Is it?"

At the Royal hotel, who was a sorte being the place for man and beast, the coming theatrical performance was avoided by universal assent, for Jink Prole sat at the head of the table and had ordered horseradish with his baked beans. When Jink ate horseradish there was usually trouble ahead for somebody.

Suddenly Jink Prole jumped from the table and strode down the street toward the opera house. When he returned he tossed a box full of yellow tickets down in front of his plate and resumed his chair.

"Gents," he said briefly. "I've bought out every ticket in this here show. It may be the hippest outfit that ever played 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' in Red Spider—and there's been some pretty bad ones, too—but I have you all to be present tonight as my special guests and each one can take as many tickets as he likes—provided he gives 'em to somebody who'll go to the show and not like he enjoyed it some. 'Here, you begin, Tony, pass 'em along.'"

Then, as the box went round the three long tables, Jink Prole arose and faced the room. His customary self-consciousness vanished with the sincerity of his motive and his words left the big hearted audience thrilling with eagerness to help the little band of strolling players.

"That there outfit may be all to the bad so far as actin' goes, but they mean all right and it's their life, they're after and it's mighty poor pickin' they get, too, I reckon! They don't come here just nacherly to aggravate us—they don't know how we feel about that there play and I don't want 'em to. Every one of 'em is dyin' to get back home to somewhere where they can earn plenty enough to eat and drink, but they can't pull out enough money to get thar. If we buy up the house, why, they'll all buy tickets home again and there'll be one less of that Uncle Tom outfit to aggravate us, see?"

They saw, and said so vociferously. "That there Little Eva and her ma, Eliza—crossing the ice, you know fellows?"

They nodded gloomily.

"They want to get back to Ojib to granddaddy's farm. Topsy wants to learn to be an engineer, and old Legree he used to be a lay preacher down east and he's goin' to tackle it again. Same way with all of 'em. Shall we send 'em home?"

There was a chorus of affirmatives. And now came the most interesting incident of the meal, for as each man took one or more tickets he solemnly dug down and paid the price for it, so when the box came back to Jink Prole it was full of silver—quarter-dollars and fifty-cent pieces, which, added to the price he had paid for the entire house, doubled the receipts for the evening performance.

Jink Prole spent the entire afternoon interviewing the different members of the company, and before the curtain arose that night each one had a sum of money sufficient to take him back home, wherever that was. Little Eva and her mother, Mrs. Frayer, were perhaps the happiest among the lot.

It was a performance long to be remembered for the enthusiasm of the audience, as the spirited acting brought forth its own reward. Jink Prole agreed to a man, and the women were unanimously of the same opinion, that never had there been so sweet an Eva so winning an Eliza, whose happiness bubbled above the tragedy of her past. Legree was positively amiable when off his guard, and only Lawyer Marks maintained his dignity and poise. Uncle Tom twined his banjo until the strings broke, and the bloodhounds leaped playfully upon Eliza and her infant. The gay and rollicking Topsy was the talk of Red Spider long after other Uncle Tom companies had departed and disbanded under the stern of elimination adopted by the community.

By the next afternoon the theatrical company had left Red Spider in the stagecoach for the nearest railroad station, with the exception of Mrs. Frayer and Eva—whose real name was Eva to Jink Prole's delight.

Mrs. Frayer remained to convince Jink Prole that he was making a great mistake to believe that he was really in love with her when he had only known her a brief twenty-four hours.

"I tell you it don't make no difference in love. It comes when it gets ready and then stays forever. If it's the right kind," said Jink convincingly. "I know mine is the right kind because I never felt like this before—and you bet an actress don't make a mite of difference to me, ma'am. Your husband bet a small manager and dyin' sudden that way, there wasn't any thing you and Eva could do except get jobs in some company. Now, I reckon you ain't so all-fired afraid of me. Mr. Corwood, he's boss of the Twin Star outfit, where I work—he's always known me and he'll tell you. And there's a little house down by the East creek, near the schoolhouse, handy for Eva, here, and it's wallin' for some married chap to take it. I leave it to you, shall it be me? And you? And Little Eva, here?"

Jink's arm was around Eva, and her fair cheek was pressed against his brown one. Mrs. Frayer's dark head was bent in confusion at this rapid wooing, but the little dickerer color in her cheek betrayed that her heart was not untouched.

Jink Prole, late in approaching matrimony, was now impatient of delay. "Eliza," he urged at last. "Jest you make believe you're in that play and make across the ice and sit beside me and Little Eva."

And Jink Eliza crossed the ice for the last time.

Very Tiny.

"What a tiny it is, you know. Why, you could just as well be with a partnerish!"

BEST EVER HELD IN THE COUNTY

East Jordan, Mich., February 10, '13.
The Three Belts School, hereby agrees to pay to the Charlevoix County Fair Association the sum of ten dollars, same to be used in the erection of an Educational and Fine Arts building. This note shall be due and payable on September 1, 1913. It is understood that if said building is not at that time completed, this note shall become void. Signed, Beryl McDonald, Secretary of School.

Ernest Praslee, Teacher.
E. H. Wamgenman, Director.
David Gannt, Moderator.

Teachers from all parts of the county are taking an interest in this matter and we are assured that the building will be built.

The teachers were united in the opinion that this was one of the most valuable meetings that has been held in the county.

Supt. Northon of East Jordan, Miss Himes of Charlevoix and Mrs. Kaden of Boyne City acted as a committee on resolutions and submitted the following report which was adopted.

Whereas the National Education Association and the Michigan State Teachers' association have endorsed equal suffrage for men and women and

Whereas, the work of instructing the youth of our land in the duties of citizenship devolves largely upon women teachers, therefore, be it Resolved: That we favor the early re-submission of the amendment to the constitution granting suffrage to women.

Resolved further that we favor a compulsory free text book law and are opposed to legislation leading to state uniformity of text books.

Resolved that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to our Senator and Representative at Lansing and that they be published in the newspapers of the county.

The teachers' pension bill stirred up considerable discussion and it was decided that the best thing to do would be to become thoroughly acquainted with the provisions of the present pending bill and to acquaint Representatives as to the wishes of the teachers of the county.

To this end a resolution was passed that if possible the commission or come and mail to the teachers a copy of the bill.

What promised to be a bad fire was nipped in the bud Friday morning when the roof of the West Side school house ignited from a flying spark. The fire department responded promptly to the alarm and had considerable trouble extinguishing the blaze which had worked under the roof. However the damage is small and school sessions will be resumed in the building next Monday morning.—East Jordan Herald.

Andrew Johnson, a man about sixty years of age, was killed by a D. & C. R. freight near Alba, Wednesday afternoon. He was walking on the track east of Alba near the gravel pit when one of the log trains approached him. Both the whistle and the bell on the locomotive were used to warn him, but he evidently did not hear until the train was nearly upon him when he tried to get out of the way. His skull was fractured and he died at once. The remains were taken to Alma where considerable difficulty was experienced in identifying him. His home was in Grand Rapids.

BEATTIE-BOWDISH.

Well Known Charlevoix Young People Married Early Wednesday Morning.

Married, early Wednesday morning, at the Baptist parsonage, Rev. B. Atchison officiating, Clarence Beattie of Marion and Miss Ruth Bowdish of this city. Immediately after the ceremony they took the train for southern Michigan, where they will make a short visit, after which they will be at home at Mr. Beattie's farm south of the city.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Beattie are well known in this city and their many friends unite in wishing them a happy and prosperous life.

Business Administration.

The coming city primary is one which is of vast importance to every tax payer in this city, and they should carefully consider the qualifications of the different candidates before casting their votes.

Harry Nicholls, candidate for mayor, needs no words of eulogy as a careful, conservative business man. With Mr. Nicholls at the head of our city government we would be given the services of a man whose business ability is unquestioned and who would bring to the service of the city the same acute judgment which has marked his success in the conduct of his private business.

L. S. See, candidate for alderman in the first ward, has equal claims as a successful business man, whose services it would be fortunate for the city to secure. As a member of the board of public works Mr. See was instrumental in securing several improvements in the conduct of the business affairs of the city, among them the enforcing of the payment of light bills by the 28th of the month.

If you believe that the best interests of the city demand that we secure the best business talent, obtainable, cast your vote for the men whose past record shows that in business affairs they have met with success.—Adv. 811

was not uplifted. He had read the news of the morning and knew that at that very hour several hundred of his fellow citizens in convention assembled were naming him to a high honor, and he took no joy in it. For the announcement was but the scheduled climax of a traitorous stage mob. And the victory was not for him, nor for his principle, nor had he served, but for a man whom he had condemned, for an admission he believed to be wrong. He was like enough, or small enough, to prefer to resent being catapulted into power by the strength of another arm, and he was honest enough to hate the means he knew must have been used. He could not exist. The advancement had come too late. The fiery eagerness of youth was gone.

He longed not for a sword, but for peace—the peace of the hills, of the growing things, of the commonplace from which since he had lost.

A sound, strange for that hour and place, slowly pierced his abstraction. He raised his head, startled, listened. It was the courthouse bell. Another joined in, and another, until all the bells of the town were ringing. The iron clang was for him!

He walked slowly on. As he rounded the foot of the knoll, he heard another sound rising to mingle with the clamor of the bells, cheering voices. He had a strong desire to turn back and flee to some hiding place in the hills, but he forced himself to march forward.

At the northernmost edge of the town he perceived a rapidly changing figure. It was Jeremy Applegate.

"Heard you came out this way," Jeremy gasped, "an I wanted to be first to tell you. Nominated by acclamation at 3:45 this afternoon!"

John felt so good since Applegate's John, beholding the tears shining in honest Jeremy's eyes, felt the moisture rise to his own. His heart leaped sharply; it was something to receive even if one has not earned, such loyalty!

Down Main street came a team drawing a double-seated spring wagon. From the wagon descended a silent trio whose handclasp eloquently told what awkward lips could not phrase.

"Drive into town to get the news of the convention," he explained. "They said you'd gone out the pike, so we drove out to fetch you in. They're waiting for you, consider'ble excited."

"They're found out," said Dan "Criswell," all at once that you're a great man."

"Low I claimed the American people, little town," confessed Styles, which caused Criswell and Criswell to laugh.

"Sit in," commanded "El," "Come right along, Jeremy."

They all climbed into the wagon. John with his compressed as if he faced an ordeal. And indeed he did. "El" was quick to perceive what Jeremy in the hysteria of his joy had overlooked. His great, hairy hand fell on John's knee in a tight grip.

"I want to say something while I got the chance. I guess there's more to this than appears to be. But I have faith in you, John Dunmear. I have faith that you'll govern this state in the face of God and the love of your fellow men."

"Whatever you say," supplemented Styles, "I'll believe that."

"An' so long as we got faith in you, we needn't lose faith in yourself," Criswell concluded.

John did not answer. He was just speaking just then and later when his townsfolk acclaimed him.

At home took place a wonder. Judge Dunmear, almost forgetting the judicial dignity, slipped John on the back and exclaimed: "My son, this is a happy hour. I always knew you would make your mark."

At which Miss Roberta sniffed. But when she tried to convey her felicitations her tongue refused the unaccustomed office, and she broke away to prepare a supper that should do justice to the occasion.

That evening Benton county merrily, with torches and bouffies and fireworks. John made a speech at his home—not much of a speech. It is true, but his audience was not hypocritical. It lasted just three minutes. Then the band began to play "America." For a little a deep hush fell. Then some one—later identified as a one-legged, hysterically happy old soldier—began to sing in a cracked, quivering voice. Something that passed beyond mere jubilation stirred. With one accord the crowd lifted up its voice and sang "My country, 'tis of thee."

The solemn, stately measures died away. A young woman under a tree at the edge of the crowd discovered an abandoned tears coursing down her cheeks. A last cheer was given, and the famous celebration passed into history.

At his window John Dunmear, looking with troubled eyes up into the silent, starry night. It was ungodly, perhaps, but he could not help thinking of the lean years of defeat and discouragement. And he wondered. Was the hymn still ringing in his ears of an abiding passion of modernity?

CHAPTER XXI. The Price.

THE next day John's office was besieged by a stream of neighbors, calling with a new-born diffidence to say in person what they had said in mass the evening before. No one doubted that he would receive an enormous majority. It was not until the middle of the afternoon that Halg found him alone.

"Well, Cato," he grinned, "they tell me they're a little excited down Carthage way."

John smiled faintly. "Not much, I suspect. I've been thinking of Cato for not even a relative. Poor Jerry Brent?"

"First guess? You can think of him? Guess you haven't read his interview?"

"Yes, I have."

"They alluded to Brent's coming to the convention, in which he made numerous sarcastic references to the 'lofty souled uplifter who had sold out to the gang for an office'."

"It's the cry of a bitterly disappointed man. Brent's chance of a lifetime is gone. He knows he can't beat you, and he's sore. I wouldn't mind it."

"I don't, I'm sorry for him. However, I have beaten Sherrod. I really believe."

"Look here, old man; I think I understand how you're feeling over this. You're not very happy because you think it isn't your victory—that you have it only by blackmailing a man you dislike."

"I don't dislike Murchell—personally."

"At least you don't approve of him politically. Down at the bottom of your heart, you're a little peevish because a bit of trickery has got what your theory of fighting wouldn't win. And you feel that in sacrificing, for merely personal considerations, what you conceive to be a duty to the general scheme of things, you have been weak. Well, you're right. You have been weak. And I'm glad of it. It will help you to understand that no cold, abstract, ideal of duty that ignores the primitive selfish instincts in men can attract, much less inspire, them. The truly good inpires no sympathy. The point of this matter is, out of your weakness has come nothing but good. The team will eventually become a sound institution, and you'll suppose you'll all that you'll make a better governor than Sherrod or Brent?"

"I hope so. But that has come about only through an accident over which I have had no control."

"Remember another thing," Halg continued. "Three weeks ago this county cast you aside. Now it is telling its foot heel off for you. The American people worship the great god Success. Keep successful. You've been promoted from a lofty souled uplifter to a practical politician for the glory of God. Accept the promotion!"

He was relieved to note that John could laugh. "And here," he grinned, "length the reading of my last lesson. It's one thing to share my vast store of wisdom with John Dunmear, the visionary reformer, and quite another to lecture the next governor. Funny thing what a difference a prospective office makes in one's attitude toward a man."

John smiled absently. He was thinking.

"Halg," he said abruptly, "I suppose I'm an obstinate pig. But, honestly, I'd give all I hope to possess to be able to answer you. If only they'd nominated me as district attorney, I'd expect that. Or if I could become that the present hallababoo were not artificially manufactured."

Even while he spoke footsteps sounded in the outer office, and there was a knock. John opened the door to admit Murchell.

"Good afternoon," was the latter's unsmiling greeting.

"Won't you come in and sit down?" Murchell accepted the invitation. There was a moment of uncertainty. Then Halg reached for his hat.

"You needn't go on my account," Murchell answered the move. "In fact, I'd like you to stay."

Halg resumed his seat. He and John kept the silence of surprise.

But the senator recognized no occasion for constraint.

"I see," he said, glancing around. "You keep the old office just the same. I remember when your grandfather built it. He was a man who accomplished things."

"And I am not. Is that your point?" "Have you the right to be bitter?" Murchell asked quietly. "When a man still young has in six years so impressed himself and his ideals on 7,000,000 people that they demand him for governor, and demand with an enthusiasm I have rarely seen?"

"Manufactured by you?"

"Stimulated," Murchell corrected briefly and continued. "And through him are beginning to realize, even vaguely, their political responsibility, he has something to his credit. I think a good many men who think well of themselves reach old age without accomplishing so much. There are two ways of serving a reform. One is as the preacher, the dreamer. He is useful because he points out the way we shall go. The other is as the constructive leader, the man who takes the forces he finds ready to hand and uses their power to change conditions as the people are prepared for change."

"You," he turned to John, "have got to decide now which you will be. You are going to hold a great office. You're going to think you've found this out already—let's say so—though it seems to those who haven't told it. The man who would fill it with unflinching wisdom and justice, with exact honesty, and still be useful—must be as stern and unyielding as the forces of nature, and as strong."

"And I am not that." But the bitterness was lacking now.

"No man is," Murchell said quietly. "I've got you the nomination through methods you won't consider clean. I've made promises you won't like, but that you must keep, or we'll both be destroyed politically."

Without excusing or concealing it, single unblinking he narrated the story of the campaign and the convention.

The shuffling of feet in the outer room gave John the excuse to leave. He was heard dismissing the visitor. But many minutes flew by before he returned.

It was little enough time for what he had to decide.

A marvel had been wrought. To Murchell had been given a new purpose. But Murchell, the workman, could never change. He was too old. His lack of respect for the people and power himself, the habit of judging things by the end, fixed through a lifetime, would persist. And he was the stronger man, his greater genius. The instinct for mystery must be served. Who joined him did so as a follower, to be dominated by the leader's head and philosophy.

"If only I could answer him!" John cried within himself.

But his experience, silencing inspiration, had not taught him that answer.

There was but one way for him to decide. The trap of circumstance sprung by his own weakness, held him fast. Having accepted advancement at the hands of that which he believed to be wrong, he might no longer openly fight against it. As an enemy to the machine whose beneficiary he had become, he would be discredited, unconvincing. His only hope for usefulness lay in the proffered alliance, in Murchell's new purpose.

For a little Halg sat in the unworldly silence of embarrassment. Then he said abruptly:

"Senator Murchell, I'd like to apologize if you will let me."

"For telling the truth? It isn't necessary."

"No, for following my imperfect, thoughtless intervention responsible for your action."

"You don't believe that now?"

"I do not. And—Halg hesitated in the masculine awkwardness before settlement. "And I know Dunmear can trust your offer."

Soon John returned. He held out his hand to William Murchell.

"I haven't the right to refuse."

He was no longer a voice. He had passed from the wilderness to the hums of men, where action, not preachments—achievements, not prophecy—were the currency of life.

Was he weak, the theory of life and growth he accepted wrong? To this day John Dunmear often asks the question. Sometimes he doubts. But then, looking back over what has been done and foreseeing a fairer triumph he puts away the question. For the compact, that day struck, held. Under Murchell's tutelage he learned to compromise, to substitute craft and intrigue for the honorable, open methods he loved. But he has never lost sight of his purpose and, though there have been halts and detours and even retreats, the general direction has been forward. When his time came William Murchell died, not greatly honored by a cynical world that looked for no good thing from Nazareth, but content in the belief that the forces he had set in motion would in the end undo his evil. As for Dunmear, he is still a compromiser, but still fighting, an old hand in a new movement whose end is not yet. He is glad to believe that upon his foundation other men shall be able to build with clean hands.

And he found one source of happiness over which no cloud has hovered.

When Murchell and Halg left him that afternoon, to resume kindly in under his went out into the country. He walked for two miles or more and then, turning, went swiftly homeward.

But as he skirted the foot of the knoll he was brought to an abrupt halt. For there, tethered to a bush, stood a horse that he recognized—Criswell, less fiery than of yore, but sleek as ever and with many a fast gallop left in his stony muscles.

For a moment John looked, hesitant, at the path up which she doubtless had climbed. Then in sudden resolution he went up.

She was standing by the big bowler looking away at the hills that rose, rank upon rank, until the last, became ing sunshine. He caught his breath at sight of her, sense of all else obliterated.

She seemed to feel his nearness and turned. For an instant, without greeting, they looked at each other, these two whose romance was almost as old as life itself. But to them it was unique, all their own. To him the love had been one order that had not burned out in the years of failure. To her it had been a growing thing that could not be killed, reaching out its tendrils until it possessed her wholly, eating out vanity and fear, making her his through weakness and strength in victory and defeat. Shaken, they looked away quickly, on the face of each had been written what the other most desired to see.

She waited for him to speak, but the tongue that had held thousands silent under its spell stubbornly refused to be eloquent in this supreme moment.

"I saw Criswell," he said lamely, "and I came up."

"Obviously," she laughed bitterly. "I came up here because it is the highest point in the county; but, of course, you know that, and you can see so far. It gives one a faint hint of the humanness of things and of one's own insignificance. It is very good for the soul, I assure you. I needed it, feeling so important because I had been working."

"Working?"

"Does the notion seem so absurd? She tossed her head girlishly. "I think it fine. I didn't know time could pass so quickly and happily. Only my task was very simple and unimportant. I fear, helping father straighten out some of his papers. This morning you know, he turned the back over to the new cashier, and tomorrow he becomes manager of the real company. Our affairs are all settled. The ride home is good and next week we move into the old one. We are to live here always. It seems like coming home."

"See?" she went on breathlessly, as though to hold back the dread of what she knew was gathering on his lips. She held up a hand, two phalanges of which were sadly ink stained. "My badge of honor! It isn't very pretty, is it? But then I had to hurry into my riding things. We work-toters, you aren't listening?"

"Katherine!"

And she who unasked, had twice dared to know her love now trembled violently before that of which she was not afraid. While she was looking at the hills before her came she had been doubting—a last faint doubt raised by words of his own. But his mountains, were lost in the blue haze. But he saw not the hills, only her, the strong, simple figure lined against the sky, her hair red gold under the stars.

Comparative Digestibility of Food

Made with different Baking Powders

From a Series of Elaborate Chemical Tests:

An equal quantity of bread (biscuit) was made with each of three different kinds of baking powder—cream of tartar, phosphate, and alum—and submitted separately to the action of the digestive fluid, each for the same length of time.

The relative percentage of the food digested is shown as follows:

Bread made with
Royal Cream of Tartar Powder:

100 Per Cent. Digested

Bread made with phosphate powder:

68 1/2 Per Cent. Digested

Bread made with alum powder:

67 3/4 Per Cent. Digested

These tests, which are absolutely reliable and unprejudiced, make plain a fact of great importance to everyone: Food raised with Royal, a cream of tartar Baking Powder, is shown to be entirely digestible, while the alum and phosphate powders are found to largely retard the digestion of the food made from them.

Undigested food is not only wasted food, but it is the source of very many bodily ailments.

Grange Column

Bay Shore Grange.

The last meeting of Bay Shore grange was called to order by Worthy Master Tillotson with all officers present except two.

Three applicants were initiated in the first degree and obligated in the second.

Lecturer's hour was taken up with the following program:

Saving Strength on the Farm, Bert B. Jones and others.

Miss Orrie Hooper, chairman of the surprise committee, and six members chosen by Miss Hooper gave the following program:

Music, Theo. Bowman.

Broken hearts were passed to decide partners for supper.

Music, Orrie Hooper.

Saving Strength in the House, Mrs. William Wallace and others.

Song by the grange.

Next meeting there will be a debate.

Resolved: That it is more profitable for the young man starting out in the city than in the country.

Affirmative: E. Barrell, captain, Arthur Zapp, O. Tillotson, Arthur Wallace, Allen Bowman. Negative: Ray Karcher, captain, Bert B. Jones, William Clare Wallace, Ambrose Froum, Otis Plunk, Judges, Mrs. Mrs. G. Long, Miss Berg, Mrs. Wallace.

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting.

Next meeting February 28.

Ironton Grange.

Ironton grange met in regular session February 11, and was called to order by the Worthy Master. On account of its being a very stormy evening a number of officers were absent and very few members were present, but those who were there were active enough to hold a very lively meeting.

One candidate was initiated in the first and second degrees.

Lecturer's hour was taken up with a lively discussion on "Grasses and Corn," followed by songs and recitations. A few suggestions were made for the good of the order and grange closed to meet again in two weeks.

Good Sunday dinners at Coatt's Restaurant for 25c.—Adv. 60

Marion Center Grange.

Marion Center grange met in regular session February 12 with all officers present except overseer. After the regular order of business was transacted a good program was given by the lecturer consisting of recitation, Lloyd Himebach, reading, Elmer Bogals; music, South family; reading, William Paquette and recitations by the little folks.

Supper consisting of oysters and other good things was served by the losing side in the contest which closed the last meeting in December.

Grange will meet again in two weeks. Attendance, 15.

Grape fruit, 5c and 6c; Florida oranges, sweet, 50c dozen. Try our 50c green tea. Mrs. B. W. Miller.—Adv. 80

Ironton Gleaners.

Ironton arbor of gleaners recently held a special meeting which was presided over by Chief Gleaner George H. Winkler. Officers were all present.

After the regular order of business, seven new applicants were marched into the hall and made good gleaners.

Tables were then spread and a good supper was served after which meeting closed, all having had a good time.

Wanted.

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL

Heard by Judge Wayne Friday Jurors in Previous Trial Examined.

Friday the motion for a new trial in the Swift case was heard before Judge Wayne. Eleven of the jurors who convicted Swift were examined and those who it was alleged had made affidavits which were published in the Youth's Outlook denied having made the affidavits, although they admitted having signed statements the contents of which their memory seemed hazy about.

In the meantime Governor Ferris has granted Swift an extension of forty days on his parole.

Died After Short Illness.

Clarence S., infant son of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Shultsberger of Barnard, passed away February 15 of indigestion. He was playing within a short time of his death, being sick only a few minutes.

Clarence was born September 9, 1912, on his mother's birthday. He was a grandchild of Mr. and Mrs. George S. Haynes of Phelps.

The funeral was held at the house Tuesday, Elder Wormser officiating. Burial at Barnard cemetery.

HALF A CENTURY

Daniel Swartz Given a Surprise Party Last Wednesday Evening.

Last Wednesday evening Daniel Swartz was given a birthday surprise party in honor of his fiftieth birthday. About 72 friends and relatives were present and the evening was very enjoyably spent in playing games and dancing. Not the least of the enjoyable features of the evening was the supper which was served from tables groaning from the load of good things.

long her life in this manner and nestling down on the cold blue rails she died. This was a sad blow to the people aboard. Up to this time they had been courageous and mirthful. But this news caused long sad countenances and bulging eyes. Fearful glances wandered out across the dreary white expanse. The train telephone was connected on a telephone wire and relief asked of Shoshone fifty miles distant. There they informed us that another trucking machine would set out at once to help us.

Some hours passed. Our second and final stick had occurred about noon. The staples of the emergency grub box were pulled and dinner was prepared on a three burner gas-oil stove. It consisted of coffee, par excellence, warmed up canned beans and corn with Uncle Sam biscuits to take the place of bread. While this was in operation the passengers, some thirty odd in number, sat around with fixed states and ashen faces. But when the smell of food reached them their attention was drawn to their gnawing appetites and general talk and laughing commenced, though each time the phone would ring the chatter would drop to a sickening hush and all would stand motionless and breathless like a court room about to hear a great verdict.

The afternoon was spent in reading, card playing, fancy work, joking about the railroads' deficient system and getting acquainted. Supper consisted of practically the same menu. The men folk chipped in together and bought of the Greeks sufficient ingredients to supply the crowd with hot cakes and syrup, which were relished by all. The drinking water had become a serious question, not quite three inches remaining in the small water tank. A message was received during supper that the second locomotive sent from Shoshone had backed and stuck some two or three miles from 614 and was suffering terribly from lack of nourishment also. This was heart rending news to the gallant occupants. Shoshone was called up and Conductor Koller made the telephone wire breathe and kink in his heated conversation. Shoshone was informed that the engine they sent "couldn't" pull a sick woman out of bed" and that he "wanted something to buck snow not a toy." After the receiver was hung up silence prevailed throughout the car.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF THE CITY

Explanation of Cause of High Taxes the Last Fiscal Year.

RETIRING COUNCIL MEMBERS

Rachow, Webster and Glassford Send Us Interesting Communication.

City's Finances Have Been Placed on a Paying Basis and Tax Rate Can Now Be Reduced.

To the Taxpayers of City of Charlevoix, Michigan:

Ladies and Gentlemen: As we are about to embrace a new year in the administration of municipal affairs there seems to be considerable discussion pro and con with reference to the mayor, the members of the council and the taxes levied in various ways for the past year. On the eve of our retirement from further service to you at present and the nominating of new officials to succeed us, we desire to furnish you with a little data and some explanations which we trust will throw some light on the whole matter of our financial situation and enable us to see why the rate of taxation was made as it has been and that the funds have been well used.

Comparative figures of taxes levied as follows:

1906 appropriations amounting to $15,572.97.
1907 appropriations amounting to $15,146.00.
1908 appropriations amounting to $17,403.54.
1909 appropriations amounting to $15,018.23.
1910 appropriations amounting to $16,285.09.
1911 appropriations amounting to $20,673.62.
1912 appropriations amounting to $28,300.50.

In addition to the above appropriations there was raised a 3 mill interest and sinking fund tax each year, except in 1906 when it was a 2 1/2 mill tax.

Prior to August 31, 1910, there was no local improvement sinking fund kept. Monies collected for the accounts of special improvements were dumped into the treasury and into the general fund and spent the general current expenses and when bonds came due and the general fund was depleted these bonds were re-funded which continuation keeps up the high interest which the city has paid for some years.

On March 1, 1909, the city owed for borrowed money at the local banks $1,500.00. To clean the streets and make the usual repairs they were obliged to borrow from that time on in anticipation of the taxes due and collectable out and after June 30th and the amount borrowed reached $13,000.00 which was paid up on September 30, 1909. Look at the amount of taxes raised for that year and you will see that it was $14,018.23. Pay the $13,000.00 on floating indebtedness and the regular expenses for a few months in the summer and what have you left? The result is that the entire tax roll for 1909 was exhausted before snowfall and only a part of the expenses for 1909 had been provided for and on November 5, 1909, the city was obliged to begin borrowing money in anticipation of the 1910 tax roll which was not available for nearly eight months. Before the 1910 taxes were collected the city had been obliged to borrow about $17,000.00. This amount was mortgaging the 1911 tax roll again and the condition became alarming to the administration of 1911 when that body of men were forced to look the situation squarely in the face, practice the strictest of economy and make every endeavor to pay the running expenses of the city and wipe out this accumulating floating indebtedness besides. The expenses for 1911 were all paid and the indebtedness paid also and we managed to get along without borrowing until early in May 1912. From that time on until the 1912 taxes were collected it was necessary to borrow $12,500.00. This was reducing it somewhat and the members of the council knowing and feeling that a good movement had been started in 1911 then felt it their duty to continue the good work and clean up the balance.

Mayor Nordrum was a member of the council in 1911 and is thoroughly familiar with the affairs of the city and the efforts the council was making and he preached economy and prudence and recommended a little less rate of taxation than the council passed. However, with this mortgage of $12,500.00 against our 1912 tax roll to clean up; extensions to be made in the water mains and electric light service and on top of all other improvements heretofore made the taking on of the city's share of the sewer and paving on Dixon avenue, both of which were a very necessary and needed work, the members of the common council did what they thought best under all circumstances and levied the tax for 1912 as above indicated.

What happened in the county affairs a few years ago? Prior to that time the board of supervisors had always insisted on making good fellows of themselves and keeping down taxes. They did not appropriate enough to fully pay all the expenditures nor did they create any sinking fund. They woke up one morning several years ago and found that the county had a floating indebtedness of about $40,000.00. Then the board of supervisors did as the city council did this year. They looked the matter squarely in the face and levied a .01 per cent county tax that year and 8 mills the next year and cleaned up the indebtedness and everyone has enjoyed the better conditions since. Had that indebtedness not been cleaned up and the county had still been so far behind this year, it would have been impossible to get a dollar appropriated for the good roads movement.

During the recent past several mutual fire insurance companies have operated in this and other counties. They wanted to keep their assessments down (assessments are taxes) and they did not levy sufficiently on their policy holders each year to pay their expenses and losses and general out-go and what happened? They went into the hands of the receiver. What the policy holders did not pay over a period of years they had to make up in a heap and it came hard. This simply goes to show that expenses

BUILD ROAD IN ONE DAY

Northeastern Michigan Farmers Will Hold Mammoth Good Roads Bee.

June 9 to Construct Highway from Bay City to Mackinaw City.

Northeastern Michigan farmers have determined to construct a highway from Bay City to Mackinaw City June 9.

The idea comes from Iowa where all the farmers turned to work with pick and shovel and built 360 miles of road straight across the state.

The plan for a bee was decided upon at the convention of the Lake Huron Good Roads association organized at Saginaw when the Michigan Good Roads association met.

The Lake Huron association is independent of the state association and the state will not be asked for aid in the construction of the Bay City Mackinaw road.

The road will pass through the counties of Bay, Arenac, Iosco, Alpena, Presque Isle and Cheboygan. It will be ready for automobiles by July 1.

The work of the mammoth bee will be accomplished through subsidiary organizations in each county and township through which the highway will pass. Each county has a county president and secretary and a board composed of one member from each township. The county organizations were perfected at the convention.

March 7 Is Date.

SIXTH ANNUAL BANQUET HELD

In Honor of Washington and Lincoln by Historical Society.

Held at Congregational Church Last Friday Evening—Was Unqualified Success.

The sixth annual banquet of the Charlevoix Historical society held at the Congregational church Friday night, in honor jointly of both Washington and Lincoln, whose birthdays both occur in February. Like the previous banquets of the society, this year was an unqualified success and interest never lagged from the time the assembled guests began to dispose of the fine menu, which was served by the ladies of the church, until "America" was sung at the close. The program follows:
Toastmaster, W. J. Rachow.
Invocation, Rev. C. E. Taggart.
Address of welcome, R. W. Kane.
Vocal solo, Miss Constance Idings.
"A blend of sadness, smiles and tears. A quaint knight errant of the plow. A homely hero, born of star and soil. A peasant prince, a masterpiece of toil." Address on Lincoln, Rev. Chester Hill.
Vocal solo, Mrs. W. J. Rachow.
Some Lincoln stories, Mrs. H. S. Harsha.
Hon. S. A. Correll, Hon. John Nichols, Miss Jessie M. Himes, Miss Emma Bennett, D. C. Nettleton.
Vocal solo, Mrs. S. A. Bush.
"He changed mankind's idea of political greatness." Address on Washington, Rev. Quinlan Walker.
Song, "America," by the Society.

GEORGE W. KENT WORSE

Telegrams Received Last Week Give News of Serious Illness of Well Known Editor.

Telegrams received in Petoskey last week announced that George W. Kent, veteran newspaper man of northern Michigan, who was obliged to leave Boyne City a short time ago on account of his health, was in a hospital in Los Angeles, California. The telegrams stated that Mr. Kent's condition was worse.

Mr. Kent was formerly editor of the Boyne City Journal, and has a host of friends in this city.

A Good Record.

R. V. Otto has completed his season's work as a poultry judge. He has officiated at 18 shows, at which an aggregate of about 8,000 birds have been on exhibition, and in every case has been offered a return engagement next year. When it is considered that among the shows at which Mr. Otto officiated this year were the big ones at Grand Rapids, Dayton, Ohio, and Sioux City, Iowa, this is a remarkable record and reflects great credit on the Michigan poultryman.—Middleton Record.

ROUND TABLE IS ORGANIZED

By Educators of Northwestern Michigan at Meeting Held in Traverse City.

Superintendent DeVoe Chosen Secretary-Treasurer—Next Meeting in Petoskey.

Friday afternoon the teachers of Northwestern Michigan met at Traverse City and plans were formed for the permanent organization of the Northwestern Michigan Round Table.

The following committees were appointed:
Permanent organization—Superintendent Butler, Boyne City; Superintendent Rode, Manistota; Professor Canton, Benzonia.
Athletic relations—Superintendent DeVoe, Charlevoix; Superintendent Munson, Harbor Springs; Superintendent Sprague, Frankfort.
In the evening a banquet was enjoyed, the principal speaker being Professor C. E. Grawn of Mt. Pleasant.

Following the banquet the Round Table proceeded to permanent organization and the following officers were elected:

President—L. L. Tyler, Traverse City.
Vice-president—J. Q. Rode, Manistota.
Secretary-Treasurer—L. M. DeVoe, Charlevoix.
Executive committee—L. A. Butler, Boyne City; J. N. Munson, Harbor Springs.

The next meeting will be held in Petoskey the latter part of April or in May. At this meeting the committee will report on the athletic.

Was Well Attended.

The court house was comfortably filled last Wednesday by farmers and dairyman in attendance upon the dairy institute, conducted by the Blue Valley Creamery company. The address by Mr. Gutterie, with stereoscopic views, along the lines of proper housing, feeding, etc., showed that he was well posted on his subject, and the discussion which followed was indicative of the deep interest in this to Charlevoix county—most important subject.

TAYLOR--MATCHETT

Popular Charlevoix Young Couple Married Wednesday of Last Week.

Married, Wednesday, February 19, at five o'clock at the home of the bride's parents in Barnard, Rev. John Biery officiating, Miss Ella L. Matchett and Walter L. Taylor of this city.

The bride was gown in white satin with net drapery trimmed with pink and white roses and wore a bridal veil and carried white bridal roses. The bridesmaid, Miss Gail Burns, cousin of the bride, wore a blue and white dress, trimmed with white satin and carried pink and white carnations.

Little Ethel Dougherty was ring bearer carrying the ring in a callaly. The groom was attended by his brother, Albert. Miss Alice Boss was mistress of ceremonies and the wedding march was played by Miss Iris Matchett of Kingsley, a cousin of the bride, who was given away by her brother, Frank Matchett. The bridal party stood under an archway of evergreens with a white wedding bell in the center.

After the ceremony a three course supper was served, the dining room being prettily decorated. Many useful presents were received. The out of town guests were Mr. and Mrs. Ira Matchett, Frank Matchett and Isadore Hoplin.

Thursday morning the happy pair left for a short wedding trip. Upon their return they will be at home at 203 Autrim street.

Both are very popular among the younger set of our city and the best wishes of their friends is sincerely given.

FIRE FRIDAY NIGHT

G. Ellsworth Dutton Loses House and Contents in Bad Blaze.

Friday night during the blizzard the firemen, who were attending their annual ball, were called out by a fire at the home of G. E. Dutton, on Autrim street, caused by a defective chimney. At the time the fire was discovered, the entire upper part of the house was afire inside. Mr. and Mrs. Dutton being away from home. With the high wind and heavy fall of snow it was a bad fire for the firemen to handle.

At this time Mr. Dutton wishes to extend a word of appreciation to the many friends who assisted him in his time of loss, as all the wearing apparel of himself and family as well as household goods were a total loss.

The house was completely gutted. Total loss over $3,000, insurance $2,200.

AROUND THE GREAT LAKES

Hydro-Aeroplane Contest Will Take Place Next Summer.

Charlevoix Will Probably Be Selected as One of the Landing Places.

J. W. Sachrider of Chicago, representing the leading manufacturers of the various types of hydro-aeroplane, was in the city Monday mapping out the route of the proposed endurance contest from Chicago to Detroit and around the Great Lakes. The flight would not be feasible with common aeroplanes on account of the difficulty of finding good landing places, but with the hydro-aeroplanes, which may light safely in water, the cruise over the lakes is practical.

The date fixed for the contest is sometime the coming summer, at least a dozen of the most celebrated flyers taking part. Each machine will carry at least one passenger and arrangements will be made with yacht clubs for races between fast boats and the planes.

A stop of some length will probably be made in this city and the contest should prove a strong attraction to our summer visitors.

SNOW BOUND IN THE ROCKIES

Robert Jarvis Writes Interesting Letter Relating His Experience.

SNOW CLAD PEAKS OF IOAHO

Conclusion of Letter Published in Last Week's Courier

Night Was One Which Will Long Be Remembered by the Sufferers—Breakfast Under Great Difficulties.

Most horrible possibilities began to present themselves, the coal might give out, the water tank was painfully low and the capacity of the food box was questioned. And to you, gentle reader, who no doubt sits beside your warm fire and bulky ladder such a situation may appear trivial. But with thirty odd people to feed on a few cans of food for no one knows how long was a distressing thought.

The writer and a fellow passenger tramped two and a half miles back down the track to a station called Blaine in search of bread and such other food as was available, but found to our great disappointment and increased hunger that there was not a single inhabitant in the village and returned to the train to the evening to find the crowd playing guessing games and singing songs. The evening passed swiftly and pleasantly but the sand man got busy with the dust stuff and the question of roast was before the house. Well, several of us noble hearted men decided we would vacate and allow the ladies such comfort as they could imagine in the stuffy car with fifteen seats for about twenty-five people.

Four of us men got some bedding (quilt and blanket long past their usefulness) and withdrew to our private car number seventeen and ninety which was filled with sacks of oats weighing two hundred pounds each. A few of these we placed in the shape as near the resemblance of a bed as possible, spread our blankets across them and retired. It took no little time to kick ourselves to fit the hard rolling surface of these beds, a la imitation. We squirmed, twisted, warped and pressed ourselves into here, there, unknown positions to fit us comfortably to the cravasses and bumps. My left ear was planted that against a bag supposed to be a pillow and my body dangled off at right angles with my neck in a strangely unbecoming equilibrium style. Sometime during the night a severe cold wind arose and blew in upon us with such violence that it caused our spine to quake and chilled us to the marrow. For some time we tugged, shivered, suffered, our teeth chattering like a nest of squirrels, when finally we were compelled to make up our bed and retreat to this we did unhesitatingly.

Concerning the baggage car a sensational sight confronted us. Mother, in her desperation, had dared to remove the gasoline stove from its bench-like shell and stretched it out across the soft pine boards. If you will recall some of your previous correspondence you will recall how passionately fond of gasoline stoves she was. The night dragged on. Gray blue light crept in the east and hung hazily over the horizon and occasionally a coyote could be seen sneaking curiously about in the snow. We, of the box car brigade, shoved our feet into the stove oven to await daylight and didn't envy Cook or Peary their Alaskan trip one little bit.

Breakfast was started about eight o'clock. The water being completely exhausted it was necessary to melt snow to make the drink, and the thirsty had to eat snow to quench their thirst or drink the smoky tasting water after the snow had been melted. The women folks, and the men who couldn't find other resting places, crawled out of their uncomfortable couches still cramped and tortured by the cold. Breakfast proceeded quietly. The sensible ones, foreseeing the danger of emptying the food box, were cautious not to eat more than was absolutely necessary to satisfy the r

United Doctors Specialist

will again be at the

CUSHMAN HOUSE, SATURDAY

March 8th, 1913

ONE DAY ONLY—Hours, 10 a. m. to 8 p. m.

Remarkable Success of these Talented Physicians in the Treatment of Chronic Diseases.

Offer their Services Free of Charge for Positively the Last Time.

The United Doctors, licensed by the state of Michigan for the treatment of deformities and all nervous and chronic diseases of men, women and children, offer to all who call on this trip, consultation, examination, advice free, making no charge whatever, except the actual cost of medicine. Ask that is asked in return for these valuable services is that every person treated will state the result obtained to their friends and thus prove to the sick and afflicted in every city and locality that all fast treatments have been discovered that are reasonably sure and certain in their effect.

These doctors are considered by many former patients among America's leading stomach and nerve specialists and are experts in the treatment of chronic diseases and so great and wonderful have been their results that in many cases it is hard indeed to find the dividing line between skill and miracle.

Diseases of the stomach, intestines, liver, blood, skin, nerves, heart, spleen, kidneys or bladder, rheumatism, sciatica, diabetes, tied-waiting, leg ulcers, weak lungs and those afflicted with long-standing, deep-seated chronic diseases, that have baffled the skill of the family physicians, should not fail to call.

According to their system no more operations for appendicitis, gall stones, tumors, gotters, piles, etc. By their method these diseases are treated without operation or hypodermic injection.

They were among the first in America to earn the name of "Bloodless Surgeons," by doing away with the knife with blood and with all pain in the successful treatment of these dangerous diseases.

If you have kidney or bladder troubles bring a two ounce bottle of your urine for chemical analysis and microscopic examination.

Deafness has often been cured in sixty days.

No matter what your ailment may be, no matter what others may have told you, no matter what experience you may have had with other physicians, it will be to your advantage to see them at once. Have it forever settled in your mind. If your case is incurable they will give you such advice as may relieve and stay the disease. Do not put off this duty you owe yourself or friends or relatives who are suffering because of your sickness, as a visit at this time may help you.

Worn-out and run-down men or women, no matter what your ailment, consult them upon this visit. It costs you nothing.

Remember, this last free offer is for this visit only.

Must You Be Bald?

What have you done to stop your hair from falling? Have you tried Rexall "93" Hair Tonic? If not, we want you to try it at our risk.

If you have dandruff, if your hair is falling out and your scalp is not clean and shiny, if you use Rexall "93" Hair Tonic according to directions for thirty days, and at the end of that time you are not thoroughly satisfied with the results and will tell us so, we will immediately hand back your money. We won't ask you to promise anything. We won't even question you. We will take your word and return your money.

Doesn't it stand to reason that Rexall "93" Hair Tonic must be a mighty good remedy and have given great satisfaction to our customers if we endorse it like this? We know of no similar remedy that is as good. It is because of what Rexall "93" Hair Tonic has done for others that we back it with our own money.

Why suffer scalp and hair trouble or be bald, when Rexall "93" Hair Tonic will remove dandruff, make your scalp comfortable and healthy, promote hair growth and tend to prevent baldness—when we will pay for the treatment should it fail to please you?

We don't obligate you to anything. You simply buy the treatment, use it, and if not pleased, come back to us empty-handed—and we will hand back what you paid us. Two sizes, 50c and $1.00 a bottle. You can buy Rexall "93" Hair Tonic in this community only at our store:

hunger. It takes just such a circumstance to find out one's true character.

Word was received that the locomotive was on its way and before function was over at noon the smoke could easily be seen. After handling the dead engine and the other, where the spark of life glowed dim, to a siding, locomotive ten forty-two, a sample of real mechanism plowed its way to us, coupled on the front car and gave a shove. Inside a gentleman sat dosing calmly and placid. The jolt of the car shook a ventilator loose immediately above his. Sahara like head and down it came, striking squarely and the glasses flying in every direction, and the gentleman moiled up as if he had suddenly been shot in the back. We had evidently been frozen to the track for the jar cut off two trucks under the box cars to jump the rails. It was quick work getting them back in place, and by 2:10 Friday P. M. we were on our way to Shishone where we arrived about 5:30, having been snow-bound just twenty-six and one-half hours.

W. S. Skelton, a merchant at Stanley, Ind., says he would not take $100,000 for the relief a single box of Foley Kidney Pills gave me. "I had a severe attack of kidney trouble with sharp pains through my back and could hardly straighten up. A single box of Foley Kidney Pills entirely relieved me." Ivy Drug Store.—Adv.

MRS. FRED PRIEBE DEAD

Had Been a Resident of North Bay for Thirty-seven Years.

The death of Mrs. Fred Priebe occurred at seven o'clock Monday morning, after an illness of several months, at her home in North Bay.

Mrs. Priebe left last October, sustaining a fracture of the limb near the hip. She was taken to Lockwood hospital, but there was no help for her, so she returned to her home New Year's day. Since that time she was a continuous sufferer until her death.

The deceased is survived by a husband, Fred Priebe, and by four sons and two daughters, Herman and William of Resort, Louis and John of North Bay, Mrs. Charles Nedolsky of Petoskey, and Mrs. Will Legner of Horton Bay.

Mrs. Priebe has lived in North Bay for about 37 years. She leaves many friends to mourn her loss.

Health Warning.

Chilled and wet feet result in congesting the internal organs, and inflammation of the kidneys and bladder, with rheumatic twinges and pain in back, generally follow. Use Foley Kidney Pills. They are the best medicine made for all disorders of the kidneys, for bladder irregularities, and for backache and rheumatism. They do not contain habit forming drugs. Take in action, quick in results. Ivy Drug Store.—Adv.

created or improvements made or money borrowed has to be paid sometime. Take an individual with a income of $75.00 per month and using for living, and other purposes $100.00 per month, in the course of a number of years he will get behind considerable. Any business enterprise that has expenses or makes improvements every year over and above of his income will likewise get into an embarrassing condition.

Since August 1910 the treasurer has kept the funds as paid into the local improvement and sinking fund separate from the general fund, as required by law, and they will be there and available for the payment of bonds and interest when due and we are happy to say that there is an accumulation in all such funds in the aggregate amount of $13,123.45. This administration consisting of Mayor Nordrum and the members of the council will close this fiscal year with some little money in the treasury of the general fund. We will not turn over to our successors a depleted treasury or a lot of debts outstanding or a mortgage on next July taxes. Instead, we will turn the city over to our successors even with the world and $13,123.45 in cash set aside for the purpose of paying bonds and interest at some future date for which it was paid in for.

Even though it may not be recognized or admitted at this time we are in hopes of some day having a feeling towards the administrations of 1911 and 1912 from the taxpayers of this city like there is now from the taxpayers of the county towards the board of supervisors that fixed the appropriations and county taxes for 1901 and 1910. You can hear it everywhere, said: "Those men were the most brave and best we have ever had. They put the county on its feet and stopped the payment of so much interest."

The floating indebtedness having been paid and the city now being even with the board, TAXES can be some lower this year, under present conditions. This will probably be fixed by the members of the council whether you select Mayor Nordrum to another year or not. Should his opponent be elected as mayor of our city the council will undoubtedly fix the annual appropriation bill the same as heretofore. In either event you should give the past administrations some credit for placing the affairs of the city in such shape as to permit the lowering of the tax rate in the city of Charlevoix. In order to keep them down we must not get too fast in making extensive improvements in paving and sewer extensions for several years. When we have paid for what now has been done then let us embrace a few other districts and create some new expenses and by all means—pay for what we do each year by gathering sufficient revenue from taxes to do so and keep our expenses within our income and not get behind as we have been heretofore, which must be paid sometime.

Respectfully submitted,

W. J. Rachow,
Amos Webster,
F. M. Glasford,
Relieving members of the common council.

NOT ONLY IN CHARLEVOIX

Similar Cases Occur Daily in This Vicinity.

Not only here in Charlevoix, but in our neighboring towns, the same good story is heard. An encouraging instance from Boyne City is given here, and will be read by us with great interest.

Frank Belmont, 25 N. Lake street, Boyne City, Mich., says: "I can certainly recommend Doan's Kidney Pills, for I have been frequently relieved by them. I suffered for months from lameness and pain in my back and was hardly able to stoop or lift. I could not rest well at night, owing to too frequent passages of the kidney secretions. Doan's Kidney Pills relieved the lameness and soreness in my back and I can rest much better at night. I feel like a different person."

The above is not an isolated case. Mr. Belmont is only one of many in this vicinity who have gratefully endured Doan's. If your back aches—if your kidneys bother you, don't simply ask for a kidney remedy, ask distinctly for Doan's Kidney Pills, the same that Mr. Belmont had. 50c at all stores. PROLOGUE.
Did you ever read a story in which humor of the finest and most delicious sort played the leading part? Did you ever tackle a tale which made you gasp by the originality of its ideas? Did you ever meet some utterly impossible persons who never lived and never could have lived and whom you might meet any day of your life?

They're here, right here in this story. They have the most impossible adventures and get into the most impossible situations, just as you or I might any day if the stage were set just right for us. Furthermore, they are very entertaining people, and they hold the interest from first word to finish.

CHAPTER I.
My Friend Wiggins is introduced. I DINED with Bartley Wiggins at the Hare and Tortoise on an evening in October, very long ago. It may be well to explain that the Hare and Tortoise is the smallest and most select of clubs, whose windows afford a pleasant view of Granary park. The club is comparatively young, and it is our joke that we are so far off tortoises, creeping through our several professions without aid from any hare. I hasten to explain that I am a chimney doctor. Wiggins is a lawyer; at least I have seen his name in a list of graduates of the Harvard Law school, and he has an office downtown, where I have occasionally found him sedately playing solitaire while he waited for some one to take him out to luncheon. He spends his summers on a South Dakota ranch, from which he derives a considerable income.

Wiggins is an athlete, and his summers in the west and persistent training during the winter keep him in the condition. As I faced him tonight in our favorite corner of the Hare and Tortoise dining room the physician was fit enough, but I saw at once that he was glum and dispirited. He had through many years honored me with his confidence, and I felt that tonight after we got well started I should hear what was on his mind. I hoped to cheer him with the story of a vast "naughty" chance paid that afternoon to the Asolando tea room, for, though Wiggins is a most practical person, I had agreed that he would be diverted by my description of a place which, I felt sure, nothing could tempt him to visit. I shall never forget the look he gave me when I remarked at about his third spoonful of soup:

"By the way, I dropped into an odd place this afternoon—Burns-Jones-Rossetti macaroons and all that sort of thing. They call it the Asolando."

I was mulling on, expecting to sharpen his curiosity gradually as I related the joys of the tea room, but at Asolando his spoon dropped, and he stared at me blankly. It should be known that Wiggins is not a man whose confidence is lightly shaken.

"The Asolando," I repeated, in breath the spell of his blank stare. "Know the place?"

He recovered in a moment, but surveyed me quizzically before replying.

"Of course I have heard of the Asolando, but I thought you didn't go in for that sort of thing. It's a trifle girlish, you know."

"That's hardly against it! I found the girl's dress altogether attractive!"

"You always were tolerably susceptible, but droll buttermilk and nut-wings' souille seem to me rather odd food for a man in your vigorous health."

"They must have discriminated in your favor. I saw in such things though to be sure I was afraid to quibble over the waitress' suggestions. May I ask when you were there?"

"Oh, I dropped in quite accidentally one day last spring. I saw the sign and remembered that somebody had spoken of the place, and I was tired and it was a long way to the club."

The Siege of the Seven Suitors

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Copyright 1910, by Meredith Nicholson

"I don't think the Asolando is a place that would attract either of us, and yet the rumors are good as such stuff goes, and the gentle handmaidens are useful to the eye—Pippa, Francesca, Gloria and the rest of 'em."

Wiggins pried open his artichoke with the care of a botanist. He had regained his composure, but I saw that the subject interested him.

"You were there this afternoon?" he inquired.

"Yes, my first and only appearance."

"And this is Monday."

"The calendar has said it."

"So you settled your bill with Pippa. I believe this was her day. She makes the change on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Her eyelashes are a trifle too long for the world's peace."

"I dare say. I haven't your charming knack, any of picking up acquaintances, so you mustn't expect me to form lifelong friendships with young women at cash desks. I suppose it didn't occur to you that those young women who tend till and serve the tables in there are persons of education and taste. The Asolando is not a common-husery. There's not a girl in that place who hasn't a social position as good as yours or mine. The Asolando's a kind of ad, you know. Ainea: it's not a tavern within the meaning of the lawmakers' act, where common swine are fed for profit. The servants serve for love of the cause. It's a sort of cult."

Wiggins excused himself shortly, and I had a glimpse of him later in the writing room, engaged upon letters, a fact in itself disquieting for Wiggins never wrote letters, and it was he who had favored making the Hare and Tortoise writing room into a den for pipe smokers. The epistolary habit, he maintained, was one that should be discouraged.

I was mulling over the evening newspaper when Jewett turned up. Jewett always knows everything. He dropped the ball into the green of my immediate interest with a neat approach shot.

"Too bad about old Wiggins," he remarked with his prelinging sigh.

"What's the matter with Wiggins?" I demanded.

"Ah! He hasn't told you? Thought he told you everything."

This was meant for a stinger and I felt the bite of it.

"You are too much honor. Wiggins is not a man to throw around his confidences."

"And I rather fancy that his boss affairs in particular are locked in his bosom."

Jewett was a master of the art of suggestion. He took an unnecessarily long time to light a cigar so that his words might sink deep into my consciousness.

"Saw her once last spring. Got a slight draft from the Bank of Boston. Followed her across the multitudinous sea Bang!"

"But Wiggins hasn't been abroad. Wiggins was on his Dakota ranch all summer. He's all tanned from the sun just as he is every fall," I persisted.

"Wrote you from out there, did he? Sent you picture postals showing him herding his cattle or whatever the beasts are? Kept in touch with you at the time, did he? Tell you his director is due to Switzerland, not Dakota."

"Wiggins isn't a letter writer nor the sort of person who wants to paper your house with picture postals. His old writing doesn't mean that he wasn't on his ranch," I replied, annoyed by Jewett's manner.

"Never dropped you before, though I wager," he chirped. "I felt you, he saw Miss Cecilia Hollister at the Asolando tea room, just a glimpse, but almost immediately, he went abroad in pursuit of her. The chevalier—that's her Aunt Octavia—was along and an odd uncle. My sister saw the bunch of them in Geneva, where the chevalier was breaking records. A whole troop of authors followed them everywhere. My sister knows the girl—Cecilia—and she's known Wiggins all her life. She's just home and told me about it last night. She thinks the chevalier is some absurd scheme for marrying the girl. It's all very queer, our Wiggins being mixed up in it."

"Don't be absurd, Jewett. There's nothing unusual in a man being in love. That's one fashion that doesn't change much. I venture to say that Wiggins will prove a formidable suitor. Wiggins is a gentleman, and the girl would be lucky to get him."

"Quite right, my dear Annie; but alas, there are others. The competition is encouraged by the aunt, the veteran chevalier. My sister says the chevalier swears in favor of the suit of a Nebraska philosopher who rejoices in the melodious name of Dick."

Jewett was playing me for all his story was worth and enjoying himself immensely.

"For heaven's sake, go on!"

"Nice girl, this Cecilia. You know the Hollisters—odds of money to the family. The chevalier's father scored big in baby buggies—responsible for the modern sleep lulling perambulators; sold out to a trust. The father of Wiggins' inamorata had started in to be a warlike painter. A founder of this club, come to think of it, but dropped out long ago. You have heard of him—Bassford Hollister. Fancy, thing his having to give up art. Great gift for the picture, but never could overcome tendency to squeakiness. Honest! Every time he painted a wave it upset him horribly. The doctors couldn't help him. Next tried to band at the big gutches downtown. There was a chance there to all on the metropolitan skyline and become immortal by doing it first, but a new trouble developed. Doing the big buildings made him dizzy. Honest! He was good, too, and would have made a place, but he had to cut it out. He was so torn up over his two failures that he blew in his share of the perambulator money in riotous living. Lost his wife into the bargain and he settled down to a peaceful life up in Westchester county in one of these cute little bungalows the real estate operators build for you if you pay a dollar down for a picture of an angel."

"And the daughter?"

"Well, Bassford Hollister has two daughters. It's the older one that has stolen Wiggins' heart away. She's Cecilia, you know. Very literary and that sort of thing, and pushed tea and cookies at the Asolando when that lobby was opened. Wiggins saw her there last spring. Miss Hollister, the aunt, whom I'm fond of calling the chevalier, picked up her nieces about that time and bawled them off to Europe, and Wiggins scampered after them. I don't know what they did to Wiggins, but you see how he acts. I rather imagine that the chevalier didn't smile on his suit. She's a holy terror that woman, with an interior without reputation for doing weird and most unaccountable things. She draws a sort of royalty on all the baby buggies in creation. It amounts to a birth tax in contravention of the free guarantee of the constitution. The people will rise against it some day."

"She's plausible enough, but she's the past mistress of ulterior motive. She got Fortner, the mural painter, up in a place she used to have at Newport a few years ago, ostensibly to do a trust or something, and she made him teach her to fire a gun. You know Fortner with his artistic ideals? And he didn't know any more about guns than a bee."

It was droll, decidedly droll. But she kept him there a month—wouldn't let him off the reservation—then she put him out for just the same, though he never painted a stroke. When he got back to town he was a wreck. It was just like being in jail. I warn you to let her alone. If you should undertake to box her times she's likely to put you to work digging potatoes. She's no end of a case."

"Well, Wiggins is a good fellow, one of the very best," I remarked, as I absorbed these revelations, "and it isn't the girl's fault he wants to marry."

"There's no telling where this affair may lead Wiggins. There's something queer in the wind, all right. The chevalier has brother Bassford where he can't whimper. I rather fancy he feels from her hand. His girls haven't any prospects except through the chevalier. Nice girls, so I'm told. Miss Cecilia Hollister is living with her aunt."

"And the other sister where does she come in?"

"Not important, I fancy. Turner is silent touching her. In fact I've never heard anything of her. But this Cecilia is no end handsome and person. Poor old Wiggins!"

I was already ashamed of myself for having encouraged Jewett to discuss Wiggins' affairs, and was about to leave him, when he snorted in a disapproving way he had at some joke that had occurred to him.

"I knew there was something," he said, "about Miss Cecilia's younger sister, and I've just learned it. The girl has a most extraordinary name, quite the most remarkable you ever heard. Hezekiah Bang!"

"That's the little sister's name. Bassford Hollister has been seeing that name for a son who never appeared, in do-ho-cho to old Hezekiah, the perambulator chap. So they named the girl for her grand dad."

I left him and leaped at the office that Wiggins had, within half an hour, left the club hurriedly in a cab taking a trunk with him. He had mentioned no mail address to the clerk, and this was very unlike Wiggins.

CHAPTER II.
The Beginning of My Adventure.

Wiggins' strange conduct and Jewett's dark hints so disturbed me that the very next afternoon I again sought the Asolando tea room, feeling that in its atmosphere I might bring forth the few facts I possessed touching my friend's love affairs.

Those who care for details to those matters may be interested to know that the Asolando is tucked away among print shops and exclusive hat-dashers, a stone's throw from Fifth avenue. The Asolando tea room is sacred to workers of the flute of their recession photographers and confident believers in an early revival of the poetic drama. There is about the interior a suggestion of tranquillity or charming choral peace, with its arts and crafts chairs and tables, its racks of books, its portraits of Browning, Rossetti, Thorne Jones and kindred spirits.

I chose a table, sat down and suggested (one does not order at the Asolando a few articles from the card an attendant handed me.

"We're out of the Paracelsus ginger cookies," she replied, "but I recommend a Russian sandwich with our own special chocolate. The whipped cream is unusually fine today."

She eyed me with a severity to which I was not accustomed, and I acquiesced without parley in her suggestion. Before leaving she placed on my table the latest minor poet in green and gold.

It was nearly 3 o'clock, and I was alone in the Asolando. The attendant, deities in their snowy gowns had vanished behind the screen at the rear of the room. The food and drink with which I had been promptly served proved excellent. Even the minor poet in green and gold had held my attention, though imitations of Coventry Patmore's odes bore me as a rule. Near the street, half concealed behind a mosquitoie grill, sat the cashier reading. A bundle of fess sticks in a green jar beside this young woman sent a thin smoke into the air. The head was bent above her book in quiet attention. The light from an electric lamp made a glow of her golden hair. She was an incident of the general picture, a part of a scene that contained no jarring note. A man who could devise, in the heart of the great city, a place so insistent with repose so fitting to all the senses was not less than a public benefactor.

It was at this moment that the adventure—actually began. My eyes were still enjoying the Rossetti-like vision of the cashier's tiny tooth when a figure suddenly darkened the street door just

Cause for Alarm

Loss of appetite or distress after eating—a symptom that should not be disregarded.

It is not what you eat but what you digest and assimilate that does you good. Some of the strongest, healthiest persons are moderate eaters. Nothing will cause more trouble than a disordered stomach, and many people contract serious maladies through disregard or abuse of the stomach.

We urge all who suffer from indigestion, or dyspepsia, to try Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets, with the understanding that we will refund the money paid us without question or formality, if after use you are not perfectly satisfied with results.

We recommend Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets to customers every day, and have yet to hear of one who has not been benefited. We believe them to be without equal. They give prompt relief, aiding to neutralize acidity, stimulate flow of gastric juice, strengthen the digestive organs, and thus promote perfect nutrition and correct unhealthy symptoms. Three sizes, 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1. You can buy Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets in this community only at our store:

HUGH SAYS HE WANTS TO KNOW

Whether the People Will Approve Fixing of State for Commissioners.

Candidate McCartney Says Attempt is Being Made to Nullify Primary Law.

To the Voters of Charlevoix County: In putting my candidacy before you for County Road Commissioner, for the two year term, I wish to impress you first with the fact that I am running independent of any clique, who wish to usurp the rights of the people, but solely as a Republican, who has the best interests of the people at heart.

The people of the State of Michigan by vote, through their representatives, have given us a primary law, which I believe, in intent is a good law, and should be lived up to by all parties and men who are in politics in our county. I believe that a majority of the people are in favor of this law, and its just application. The point I wish to present to you is this: That a "bunch," not the whole nor even the best part of our county politicians, recently "got together," and my opponent for the two year term of commissioner was one of them, and planned a slate of county road commissioners, which it was understood was to be put through regardless of the wishes of the people. It was very cleverly done and a very creditable slate from their point of view, and came nearly working out exactly as planned.

In presenting my name for your consideration, I do not wish to say anything against the ability of any of the parties concerned, but I want to know if the people of this county like the idea of having this prepared slate passed up to them, regardless of the primary law.

I wished to be judged as a free American citizen, who believes thoroughly in a government "of the people, by the people and for the people."

As to my qualifications for the office of County Road Commissioner, I feel that I am as competent as any of the candidates, and assure you that I shall endeavor to justify any confidence the people may see fit to place in me. I feel confident of the result if you will take the trouble to ascertain the truth of the statements I have made, and I earnestly desire your support. Respectfully yours,
Adv. 911 HUGH C. MCCARTNEY.

STATEMENT OF TAXES LEVIED IN CITY THE PAST TEN YEARS

Remarkable Increase the Past Season—Has the Growth of Our City Kept Pace With Increase of Taxes—Harry Nicholls Stands for an Economical Business Administration—Study Carefully the Record—Before Casting Your Vote at the Primary.

To the Republican Electors of the City of Charlevoix: Much has been said during the past year in regard to taxation in our city. The burden has been heavy, which has been caused by the increase of the assessed valuation, without any decrease in the rate of taxation.

The following is a correct statement of the assessed valuation of the city and the amount of money raised by general taxation:

1901—Harry Nicholls, Village President.
Assessed valuation.....$ 708,800
General city tax.....$ 9,610 00
Highway tax..... 1,510 00

Total general tax.....$11,120 00
1902—Harry Nicholls, Village President.
Assessed valuation.....$ 911,150
General city tax.....$ 9,111 50
Highway tax..... 2,735 00

Total general tax.....$11,846 50
1903—E. W. Couller, Village President.
Assessed valuation.....$1,261,008
General city tax.....$12,610 08
Highway tax..... 3,783 20

Total general tax.....$16,393 28
1904—E. W. Couller, Village President.
Assessed valuation.....$1,258,520
General city tax.....$15,102 24
Highway tax..... 3,292 60

Total general tax.....$18,394 84
1905—Harry Nicholls, Village President.
Assessed valuation.....$1,221,600
General city tax.....$14,639 88
Highway tax..... 3,100 97

Total general tax.....$17,740 85
*Served about 3 months, term finished by Mayor Iddings.

1906—H. L. Iddings, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$1,173,160
General city tax.....$11,937 61
Int. & sinking fund..... 2,034 96

Total general tax.....$13,972 57
1907—R. B. Armstrong, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$1,187,510
General city tax.....$13,999 17
Int. & sinking fund..... 3,562 53

Total general tax.....$17,561 70
1908—S. M. Rose, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$1,258,520
General city tax.....$11,928 51
Int. & sinking fund..... 3,583 91

Total general tax.....$15,512 42
1909—O. E. Wilbur, Mayor.

General city tax.....$11,902 91
Int. & sinking fund..... 3,635 38

Total general tax.....$15,538 32
1910—Will E. Hampton, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$1,222,850
General city tax.....$15,283 60
Int. & sinking fund..... 3,068 57

Total general tax.....$18,352 17
1911—Will E. Hampton, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$1,163,265
General city tax.....$10,671 28
Int. & sinking fund..... 4,182 65

Total general tax.....$14,853 93

1912—Olaf Nordrum, Mayor.
Assessed valuation.....$2,262,540
General city tax.....$22,260 50
Int. & sinking fund..... 6,789 32

Total general tax.....$29,049 82

The above list of taxes does not include taxes raised by special assessment for street paving or sewers, which is in addition to the above, and against the individual parcels of property, except the portion paid by the city, which on Dix Avenue would not amount to over $2,000 a year for five years, and is not a reason for the above high tax.

The present city administration went into power with a balance of $4,100.76 in the general fund. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, it voted to raise by taxation the highest amount possible, even though the assessed valuation of the city had been increased by over $800,000, which would increase the amount raised by over $9,300, $3,877.41 of which was placed in the General Street and Contingent funds, and $1,800 in the Interest and Sinking funds.

At the council meeting which voted the above tax, there were only five councilmen present, and of those, Geik C. Geiken voted against raising so large a tax. It is a strange coincidence that none of the present council, except Mayor Nordrum, whose term of office expires this year, have deemed it advisable to ask for re-election.

No doubt friends of the present administration will excuse the Mayor's part in raising this high tax pointing to him as only a presiding officer over the deliberations of the common council. However, Mayor Nordrum could have vetoed the action of the common council, and placed himself on record as against high taxation, the same as Geik C. Geiken.

Mr. Taxpayer, your attention is called to the fact that in 1910 the total general tax was $18,352.17, while in 1912, two years later, the general tax was $29,049.82, very nearly twice as much in two years time. Can it be possible that our city has grown so much in two years? Can it be possible that the necessary expenses have increased so amazingly?

Mr. Harry Nicholls, one of the candidates for mayor, stands for a reduction in the rate of taxation, as well as an economical business administration. Mr. Nicholls has very heavy business interests in the city, he being on the tax roll in the sum of $11,550, while he is interested in the following concerns which are assessed as follows: Charlevoix Lumber Co., $50,000.00, Charlevoix County Bank, $2,500.00, and the Charlevoix Theatre Co., $7,000.00, making a total of over $110,000.00.

Mr. Nicholls is thoroughly interested in this matter and believes that he can render the city valuable services as mayor, and trusts that the Republican electors will choose him as their candidate for mayor. Advertisement. 91t.

CITY PRIMARY

Several Warm Contests Being Waged for the Republican Nominations.

Next Wednesday is primary day. The first city primary ever held in this city and as the time grows closer the friends of the various candidates are all bustling. Already the value of a primary has been demonstrated, as in their efforts to receive votes the people are being informed in regard to the business affairs of the city—a real campaign of education being waged.

It looks at this writing as if the contest would be a close one between Nordrum and Nicholls, while quite a vigorous fight is in progress in the first and third wards.

Of course all the lights are for the Republican nominations—no contests being waged for the Democratic nominations. For the first time in several years the Socialists will not have a ticket in the field this year in this city.

In the county the only contest is between O. D. Hammond and Hugh McCartney, both of this city, for the two year term for county road commissioner, each being actively at work.

ATHLETIC CONTEST

beyond her. The girl lifted her head. On the instant the lamp flicked as she extinguished her light, and the aureoled head ceased to be. And coming toward me down the shop I beheld a lady, a lady of years, who passed the cashier's desk with her eyes intent upon the room's inner recesses. Her gown, of a new fashionable gray, was of the severest tailor cut. The hat was a modified fedora, gray like the gown, and adorned with a single gray feather. She was short, stout, erect, and moved with a quick, firm, like a woman, pausing and glancing at the various tables that lay between me and the door. She appeared to be engaged in a conversation of some sort, and she raised a forefinger to assist me in counting the tables. The woman passed behind her unseen and vanished. I heard the newcomer retelling:

"One two, three, four, five, six, seven." And at seven her eyes rested upon me with a look that mingled surprise and annoyance. She took a step toward me, and I started to rise, but she said quickly:

"I beg your pardon, but this seems to be the seventh table."

"Now that you call my attention to it," I remarked, gaining my feet, "I am bound to concede the point. If by any chance I am intruding?"

"Not in the least. On the other hand, I beg that you remain where you are." And without further ado she sank into a chair opposite my own. I looked at this crystal ball that was among the table furnishings, and a waitress appeared and handed the lady who had thus introduced herself to my acquaintance, a copy of the tiny card on which the articles of refreshment offered by the Asolando were indicated within a border of hand-painted blue dashes.

"Never mind that," said the lady in gray, ignoring the card. "You may bring me a savory sandwich and a cocktail, a pink one, provided, of course, you have the waitress with her eye. You have the imported caviar and your turkopolon knows the proper language of the south I have named."

"Pardon me, madam," replied the waitress, "but you have mistaken the place. The Asolando serves nothing stronger than the pure water of its own fountain of Castille. Intoxicants are not permitted here."

"Intoxicants?" repeated the old lady with asperity. "Do I look like a person given to intoxication? I dare say your Castille water is nothing but Croton whose davor has been destroyed by distillation. You may bring me the sandwich I have mentioned and with it a pot of tea. Yes, thank you, lemon with the tea."

An the girl vanished with the light tread that marked the service of the place I again made as to rise, but the old lady lifted her hand with a delaying gesture.

"Pray remain. It is not unlikely that we have friends in common, and as you were seated at the seventh table it is possible that some ordering of fate has brought us together."

She took from me in the hand which she had now unclenched the copy of my minor poet, glanced at it scornfully and tossed it upon the floor with every mark of disdain.

"What species of mental disorder does this place represent?" she demanded.

"It is sacred to the fine arts apparently; an endowed tea room where persons of artistic ideals may come to refresh body and soul. Such at least seems to be the program. This is only my second visit, but I have long heard it spoken of by artists, poets and others of my friends."

"I am sixty-two years old, you say, and I have heard you are a poet. Consider the Asolando the most picturesque thing I have ever heard of in this most picturesque city. And from a casual glimpse of you I feel justified in saying that a man in your apparent physical health might be the better business than frequenting in mid-afternoon a shop that seems to be a remarkably stupid expression of twentieth century anarchy."

"Attendance here is not compulsory," I remarked defensively.

"If you imply that I must have sought the place voluntarily let me correct your false impression immediately. I dropped in here for the excellent reason that this shop is the seventh in commercial progression from Fifth avenue."

"You were not guided by any feeling of interest, then, but rather by superstitious?"

"That remark is unworthy of a man of your apparent intelligence. I was born on the 7th of November, and all the great events of my life have occurred on the 7th of the month."

I was relieved to find that she accepted the tea and sandwiches the waitress had brought without parody. It is with shame I confess that in the first moments of my encounter I believed her capable of quarrelling with a waitress, but she thanked the girl pleasantly, lifting her head with a smile that illumined her face attractively. Her demand for a cocktail had not been wholly convincing as to her sincerity, and I wondered whether she were not playing a part of some kind. She suggested pleasant and wholesome things.

In any event the impression was wholly agreeable. I had to do with a lady and a lady of no mean degree. The marks of breeding were upon her, and she spoke with that quiet authority that is the despair of the vain and vulgar. Her features were small and delicate, her ringless hands were perfectly formed and both face and hands belied the age to which she had so frankly confessed. She was more than twice my age, and there was not the slightest reason why she should not address me if it pleased her to do so, and her obsession as to the potency of the numeral seven was not in itself proof of an ill-balanced mind. Musing thus, I reached the conclusion that this encounter was very likely the sort of thing that happened to patrons of the Asolando. My time has, however, a certain value, and I began to wonder just how I should escape. I was about to excuse myself when my companion suddenly put down her cup and addressed me with a directness that seemed habitual in her.

"I have formed an excellent opinion of your bringing up from the manner in which you have suffered my advances. If I may so call them. You not and speak like a gentleman of education. Will you kindly tell me the nature of your occupation?"

I produced one of my professional cards.

ARNOLD AMES,
Consultant to Chinamen,
Suite 22, London Building.

She read it aloud without glasses and mused a moment.

"This is very curious," she remarked, placing my card in a silver case she drew from her pocket. "This is very curious indeed. It was only yesterday that my friend General Glendinning was speaking of you. He told me that you had rendered him the greatest service in adjusting several thousand dollars in his country house at Shin-nevock. My own drooping doubtless require attention, and you may consider yourself retained. I shall make an early appointment with you. You will find my name and residence sufficient to describe on this card."

MISS HOLLISTER, Hopelott Manor.

"Oh," I exclaimed, bowing. "Any further introduction is unnecessary, Miss Hollister."

"The name is familiar? I recall that General Glendinning mentioned that you were related to the Ames family of Hartford, and your mother was a Farquhar of Charlottesville, Va. It may be that your father's name, I dare say it was he whom I met ten years ago in Paris. There is no reason therefore why we should not be the best of friends."

It was a kind fate indeed that had led me back to the Asolando, and introduced me to the host of Wiggins inasmuch as it may well be believed that I was immediately interested, at least, in her. As she smoothed her gloves, Miss Hollister continued to speak in a low, husky voice that was devoid of any of the quavers of age.

"On the day I reached my sixtieth year, Mr. Ames, I decided that my humdrum life must cease. The strictest conventional had guided me from earliest childhood. My experience of life had been limited to those things which women of education and means enjoy—or suffer, as you please to call it. Two years ago I chartered a yacht and cruised among the Lesser Antilles, enjoying many adventures. Later, crossing the Andes, and I have just returned from Switzerland, where I accomplished some of the most difficult ascents. I have a shipping bureau engaged to inform me of all rumors of hidden treasure and sunken ships, and I hope that of this something may come, as I retain a marine engineer and corps of divers and can leave at a moment's notice for any likely hunting ground. This may strike you as the most whimsical self-indulgence. Tell me candidly whether my remarks affect you."

"If it were not that your benefactions of all kinds have given you no doubt evidence among American philanthropists I might be less biased in favor of the sort of thing you describe, but your gifts to orphanages, colleges, hospitals,"

"Ah," she interrupted, "enough of that!" Philanthropy in these times is only selfish exploitation, the recreation of the conscience-stricken. But you see no reason why," she pursued eagerly. "If I wished to dig up the Caribbean sea in search of Spanish doubloons, I should not do so? Answer me frankly without the slightest fear."

"I assure you, Miss Hollister, that such projects appeal to me strongly. I have often lamented that my own talent in these eventful times. As an architect I proved something of a failure; as a chimney doctor I lead a useful life, but the very usefulness of it leaves me, and besides, many people take me for a sweep."

"I dare say they do, but unfortunately many people are fools. But I am now upon adventure. My physician pronounced me good for ten years more of active life, and I intend to keep it. If I were a young man like you I should crawl through chimneys no more, but take to the open road. I resent the harsh clime of these mean English years. As I walked among the hills that lie behind the manor this morning I heard the buzzes cutting. I should like to ask you further as to your unusual profession, but errands summon me elsewhere. However, something tells me we shall meet again."

She rose in her swift, birdlike fashion and passed lightly down the room and through the door. She had left a door ajar beside her plate to pay her check, which I noted called for only 40 cents. I glanced at the cashier's desk. The aureoled head had not reappeared, but immediately I heard a voice murmuring beside me. I had believed myself alone, and in my surprise I thought some wizardry had made audible one of the verses on the wall.

What of Rafael's sonnets, Dante's picture—

It was she whose aureoled head I had marked earlier in the receipt of my tea, the girl who had vanished as Miss Hollister appeared. She was not tall, and her eyes, I saw, were brown. She had clearly not climbed for the stairway of her years, but her serenity was the least bit disconcerting.

"Pardon me," I began, "but I am an ignorant philistine, and cannot cap the verse you have quoted."

"There is no reason why you should do so. It is the rule of the Asolando that we shall attract the attention of "The Asolando is denied to outsiders."

customers when necessary by speaking of a line of verse. We are not allowed to open a conversation, no matter how imperative, with 'listen, or the even more violent 'say'."

"A capital idea, of which I heartily approve, but now that I am waiting and idler, eager?"

"It is merely the check, if you please," she interrupted kindly. "My desk is closed, and the room will refuse further patrons for the next hour, as the executive committee of the Shelley society meets here at 4 o'clock, and the Asolando is denied to outsiders."

"This, then, is my dismissal? The lady who joined me here for a time left a dollar, which you will see, is some what in excess of her check. My own charge of 50 cents is so moderate that I cannot do less than leave $1 also."

"Thank you," she replied, much surprised by my generosity. "The tips at the Asolando all go to the Sweetness and Light club, which is just now engaged in elevating Matthew Arnold's poem in leaflet form in the jubilee district."

I bowed and had turned away when she arrested me with the line—

"My good-bide carves the casques of men."

I turned toward her. "Permit me to inquire," she asked, "whether the lady who joined you here expressed any interest in the life beautiful as it is exemplified in the Asolando?"

"I am constrained to say that she did not. She spoke of the Asolando in the most commonest terms."

The golden head bowed slightly, and a smile hovered about her lips. But her amusement of my answer was more eloquently stated in her eyes.

"I must explain that my sole excuse for addressing you is that we are required to learn, where possible, just why strangers seek the Asolando."

"In the case of the lady to whom you refer it was a matter of this being the seventh shop from the corner and my own appearance was due to the ill-drawn curiosity inspired by the staid descriptions of the Asolando."

issue of

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

Why the Little Red Schoolhouse Fails. A frank but helpful criticism of rural schools, written by Ware J. Hubbard after years of personal experience as a country school-teacher. He shows exactly what is wrong with rural schools and how that wrong can be remedied.

The Man Who Made Good. He's J. E. Fitzgerald, and the big secret of his success is: "It doesn't pay to raise things to suit your fancy altogether; raise things to suit the buyer's fancy." If you are a market gardener or in any way interested in this end of agriculture, Mr. Fitzgerald's article will help you to make more money.

An Ex-Slave's Miracle Crops. The United States Department of Agriculture has just issued a Bulletin telling of the marvelously large crops raised by an ex-slave on a two-acre farm. But Bulletins, like coins, have two sides; this article, by Barton W. Currie, shows the "other side" of this remarkable Bulletin.

Simple Accounts For Farm Business. "For want of a nail . . . the kingdom was lost, and for want of a sound system of keeping accounts many a once valuable farm has been lost." To help you avoid just such a pitfall, Morton O. Cooper, an expert farm accountant, has worked out a simple but practical system for keeping farm accounts.

Breeders Who Make New Breeds. Years of effort on the part of enterprising and progressive farmers and scientists in developing new and better breeds in plant and animal life were announced at the annual convention of the American Breeders' Association, held recently at Columbia, S.C., and this week's issue contains an article telling just what these breeders have accomplished and how their achievements will benefit farmers and stockmen.

Correcting Concrete Silo Troubles. An important article showing why concrete should be used in building such permanent structures. Common dangers that should be avoided are also pointed out.

Mushrooms at Home. The market for mushrooms is always good, but the supply of mushrooms is never up to the demand. This article, by S. L. de Fabry, an expert mushroom grower, shows just how to grow and market mushrooms.

Dairying On Rough Land. If you have a rough, broken portion of land that seemingly is useless, you had better read what Charles S. Phelps says about using just such land for pasturing dairy cows.

The Farm That Won't Wear Out. Dr. Cyril G. Hopkins' Of the Illinois Experiment Station final summing up of his series of articles on the "how" of maintaining permanent, successful agriculture. You will get the whole gist of the important series in this one article.

Odd Jobs for the Automobile. A fifteen-minute article by Charles E. T. Schapsa to show how an automobile can be used on the farm to sow seed, thresh grain, churn butter and cut feed.

Concrete Corncribs. In one section of the country progressive farmers are building concrete corncribs. Why they have adopted this new form of construction and how the work is done is explained by William Walter Smith.

SPECIAL FEATURES FOR WOMEN

The Country Gentleman this week talks to the woman who is a victim of the "waxing" habit. It is critical, but helpful.

Grandmother's Recipes are a number of good old-fashioned recipes that today are among the "lost arts" of the kitchen.

The Country Woman's Clothes page gives a number of designs for waists that are attractive and yet practical and serviceable.

Keep Your Heirlooms, for as old as they are, they are better than much of the present-day furniture, etc. Moreover, as Frederick Heaton points out, they're worth money. The antique dealer knows they are of your old furniture and so should you.

FOR POULTRY FOLKS ONLY

A Real Cure for Roup that cured 98 per cent. is explained by F. S. Jacoby. This new treatment has been worked out by the Ohio State University.

Hen Brooding, by W. A. Sherman, discusses the advantages of natural brooding over the manufacture of artificial brooding.

The Congressional Calendar. This week THE OBSERVER discusses among a number of other things the new Democratic Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, and the attitude of its members toward conservation.

The Crops and the Market. A weekly department written by one of the foremost financial authorities of the country, giving an agricultural-financial forecast that will be of the utmost value to every farmer and business man having dealings with farmers.

Everyman's Garden. To the farmer who has a small vegetable patch for "family use"—to the suburbanite, too—the question of good soil and how to take care of it is vital. This week EVERYMAN'S GARDEN takes up this important question of garden soils.

The R. F. D. Letter Box. No matter what you want to know about agriculture, stock raising or poultry, write to us. An expert (who knows what is practical) will answer you—which is better business than learning by stumbling.

Grange Column

Charlevoix Pomona

Charlevoix-Pomona grange met with Maple Grove grange February 20, with an attendance of about 50, which, considering the weather, was very good.

The lecturer being absent, a committee was appointed to take charge of the program. Some of the topics discussed were farmers' institutes, fruit growing, hog raising and milk testing. The singing by Emory Pierce and Key Smith was especially fine.

In the evening Cland Bowen, Emory Pierce, Emil Nason and Pearl Chandler were obligated in the fifth degree, after which all members received the new annual word.

Next meeting will be held with Peninsula grange, Thursday, April 17.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh That Contain Mercury

Mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except in mercurials from reliable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free. Sold by all Druggists. Price 50c per bottle. Take Hall's Family Pills for constipation.

Charlevoix Grange.

Charlevoix grange met in regular session Monday night with an attendance of sixteen. In the absence of the master the meeting was presided over by Worthy Lecturer Usher.

Program consisting of music and recitations was furnished by the lecturer.

Visitors were present from Maple Grove Grange. A full attendance is most earnestly desired at the next meeting as important matters must be taken up.

HOW EXCESSIVE WATER WASTE CAN BE STOPPED.

English Authority Would Substitute "Showers" For Bath Tubs.

Aside from the water which flows from leaky pipes or fixtures, the amount which is considered to be wasted in a given city might be estimated differently by different investigators. This is suggested by a paper by an English author dealing with water waste in England, one of his statements being that an estimated consumption of twenty-three gallons per individual for household use is "lavish."

This writer, W. Whitehouse, in a paper before the Institution of Municipal Engineers (England) goes so far as to recommend the abolition of bathtubs and the substitution thereof of showers, baths or hip baths in order to reduce the consumption of water. In his opinion, 150 gallons per day is an abundant supply for an average household. Further precautions against waste which he suggests are the restricting of water closet flush tanks to two gallons capacity, increasing the number of valves in mains so that a less amount may be wasted in case of repairs, in introducing pressure reducing valves and plugging new washers on leaky faucets without charge to the consumers.

This last has been the practice of the author for some time in the cities where he is in control of the water works, with the result that the average consumption does not exceed twelve gallons per capita per day, including that used for trade purposes.

MUNICIPAL "MOVIES."

Little Town of Haven, Kan., Starts a Good Idea.

Kansas has one of the few municipalities moving picture shows in the country. It is at Haven, a little town in Reno county. If there is another municipality owned moving picture show house in the country the directors of the different film companies have no knowledge of it.

Haven was so small that there were no moving picture shows, and only occasionally would one be given there by a traveling company. Every one in the little town enjoyed the pictures. No one was willing to risk his money in building a moving picture house, as all the business was out of the town.

It is a great success. The pictures are shown in the town hall every night. An admission fee is charged to pay the operator and the license on the films, which are changed twice a week. When the receipts are larger than the expenses free shows are given until the fund is exhausted or additional and special films are purchased and the show is increased and kept going with more pictures until the fund is used up. The town built an elaborate theater. During the summer the picture shows were given in the open air, and this winter they will return to the town hall.

$2,250.00 now form a part of budget for this year.

This loan (less the cash we had on hand) together with the purchase of the land and the repairs and alterations to the buildings as outlined, figure up in the aggregate $10,000.00. This, you will note, is very nearly double our taxes and had it not been for these extra items creeping into our appropriations for the current year, it is plain to be seen that our school tax would not have exceeded 5¢ mills.

For the information of all concerned, it might be well at this time to express our views as to the present worth of our school properties consisting of real estate, buildings, furniture, fixtures and school equipment, etc., and after a careful study of the matter we place the figures at $200,000.00 against which there is a bonded indebtedness of $100,000.00. The buildings and contents are covered by insurance to the extent of $50,000.00.

The bonded indebtedness is in detail as follows: $50,000.00 known as the "Hague" bonds maturing September 2, 1918, bearing 4% per cent interest, payable semi-annually, $2,500.00 on the second day of March and a like amount on the second day of September.

$50,000.00 known as the "Waller" bonds, maturing $10,000.00 each year on the first day of September. The last one maturing September 1, 1912. Interest at 5 per cent, payable semi-annually on the first day of March and first day of September.

All of which is correctly submitted.

PROGRESS OF Y. M. C. A. WORK

Secretary Ball Makes Report Relative to County Organization.

WORK PROGRESSING NICELY

Secretary Has Attended Several Meetings of Various Organizations.

Makes Several Recommendations For Increasing
The Interest of Boys of County in Work by Co-operation With Societies.

January 13th marked the beginning of rural Y. M. C. A. work in Charlevoix county. To accomplish anything very tangible during a month's time is out of the question but the secretary has had an opportunity to travel over the county and learn something of the need for the work in the different localities. During the first month Secretary Ball has spent a large part of his time in making the acquaintance of the men and women with whom he will come most actively in contact carrying out the duties of his office. In visiting the schools of the different towns he has met the members of the teaching profession. Attendance at several sessions of the farmer's institutes furnished the opportunity to meet some of the agricultural leaders of the county. The county teacher's institute made it possible to get acquainted with a large number of the rural teachers. Numerous opportunities have presented themselves making it possible for the secretary to meet a large number of the business and professional men of the several towns. Besides making an effort to get acquainted with the people an effort has been made to acquaint the people of the county with the rural Y. M. C. A. plan of work through public addresses, articles in the county papers, and through printed matter sent out from the secretary's office. At the conclusion of the first month's work of investigation the following recommendations have been made to the county committee by Secretary Ball:

1. That he be permitted to continue his work of investigation with the following things in view:
 - a. Discovery, enlistment and training of leadership for the spring and summer activities.
 - b. Securing at least thirty boys to attend the State High School Boys' conference at Torch Lake June 21 to July 4.
 - c. Securing and putting in shape a satisfactory site for the Charlevoix County Boys' camp.
2. Continued and continual investigation to secure competent leadership for the organized group work in the fall and winter.
3. That he be permitted to co-operate with:
 - a. The high schools of the county in conducting high school and grade school athletic meets with the idea of providing organized and supervised athletic life for at least 95 per cent of all boys weighing 65 pounds or over.
 - b. The county school commissioner and the rural school teachers in conducting township rural school meets. Estimated that 95 per cent of the boys will complete the association will be providing athletic life of the right sort for between four and five hundred boys.
 - c. The doctors and dentists of the county in arranging for free health lectures in all of the rural and graded schools of the county.
 - d. The grange of the county in organizing a boy's potato club and conducting the contest with the exhibit and awarding of prizes at the county fair.
 - e. The county fair committee in conducting a county rural school athletic meet at the annual fair on what is to be known as school day.
 - f. The county committee in conducting the first annual summer camp for boys twelve and sixteen years old aiming to secure the attendance of fifty boys.
 - g. The county committee in conducting a county water carnival some time during the month of August.

WILL VOTE IN APRIL

Question of Equal Suffrage is Again Submitted to The Voters of Michigan.

Both the house and senate, by large majorities, having passed the resolution to submit the amendment to the constitution granting to women the right of suffrage to the voters of this state at the April election, a hot campaign will probably be waged from now on.

Last fall the same amendment was voted upon and was defeated by a small majority. The advocates of the measure cried fraud in the count, but when a recount was ordered failed to make good on their charges.

The campaign last fall was largely a one-sided affair, the opponents of the measure feeling there was little danger of the amendment prevailing not putting up an active fight. This spring however it will be different, the close vote of last fall indicating that a large per cent of Michigan voters are of the opinion that equal suffrage rights should be given to both sexes and the anti's will put up a strong campaign.

The question is one which has strong arguments on both sides and before casting their vote every elector should carefully study the question as it is different from most questions and if once made a portion of our organic law can never be undone.

CAMPAIGN FOR BETTER ROADS

Will Open Next Week at Big Meeting at Traverse City.

Will be Attended by All Highway Officials in This Region.

The 1913 road building campaign for the northern half of the western Michigan region is to be formally opened by a big two-days' meeting at Traverse City, March 13 and 14. The gathering is called by the state highway department and is to be a round-up for the road builders of nine counties. The county and township highway commissioners of Antrim, Kalkaska, Benzie, Leelanau and Grand Traverse will be summoned to the meeting, and the supervisors and county clerks for these counties will be invited to be present and to participate in the discussions. In addition, the county commissioners for the more distant counties of Manistee, Westland, Charlevoix and Emmet will be summoned to the meeting.

All the well-known "Better Roads" men in this part of the state will be urged to be on hand to help along the campaign for highway improvement.

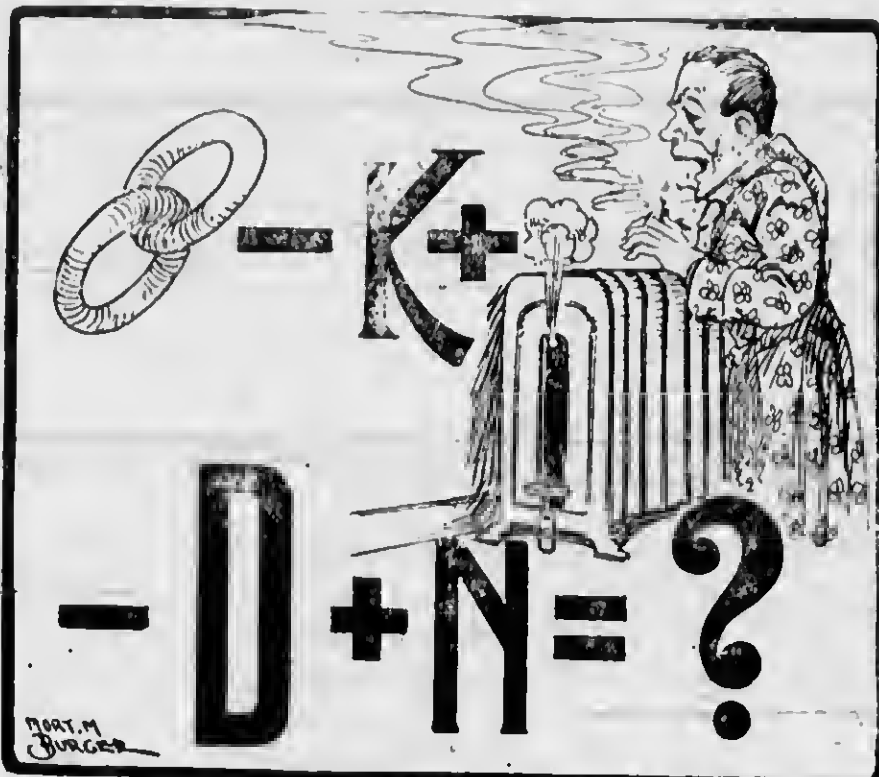

The meeting is called for the purpose of giving instructions in road building methods and for making inventory of the progress made to date of what is likely to be done the coming season. The state highway department will be represented at the meeting by Deputy Highway Commissioner Frank F. Rogers and Highway Engineer Leroy C. Smith. Among the features planned are illustrated lectures, which will tell the story of road building for this section.

It is planned to have maps at this meeting which will show the western Michigan roads already built, and the county commissioners attending will be asked to suggest route across their respective counties for the proposed west Michigan lake shore highway which is to reach from Chicago to Mackinaw City.

SPECIAL DELIVERY

Has Been Extended to The Parcel Post System
by Postmaster General.

The special delivery service has been extended to the parcel post system. This means that any parcel mailed under the new system with a special delivery stamp affixed will be delivered as promptly as a special delivery letter. The goods will be delivered as soon as received at the post office where they are sent instead of being kept overnight or until the next regular delivery as is often the case.

MEETING HAS BEEN CALLED

To Meet at The Court House in This City March Fourteenth.

TO ORGANIZE FARM BUREAU

Under The Plan of United States Department of Agriculture.

Bankers of The County Are Back of The Movement
—All Interested in Promotion of Agriculture Urged to Attend.

It is proposed to employ in Charlevoix county a farm expert under contract with the United States government. Kent, Kalamazoo and Allegan counties have already engaged such experts and they are now at work giving good satisfaction.

The duty of the expert is to advise with the farmers respecting the preparation, fertilization and cultivation of their soil, the rotation of their crops, and improved market conditions. It is expected that he will be a horticulturist and will be specially qualified to be of assistance to fruit growers. He will be in continual touch with the best authorities on agriculture in both Washington and Lansing. If an able to answer the questions asked he will find a man who can. If necessary, specialists will be brought into the county to assist in the solution of difficult problems. It is estimated that the salary of this expert will be $1,000.00 per year and that the cost of transportation, clerical hire, and office equipment will be $1,200.00 per year.

Towards these expenses the United States will pay $1,200.00. The crop improvement committee of the council of grains exchanges will pay $500.00. It is therefore necessary to raise in the county $1,300.00 per year to secure this service. The banks of the county have united to assist in the organization of a better farming association and to help pay for this service in Charlevoix county. The Michigan Bankers' association when in convention at Kalamazoo, last June, appointed an agriculture committee and this committee is urging the bankers in every county to assist in the better farming methods to which call they cheerfully and willingly respond.

It is planned to organize a better farming association which will have charge of the work, the members of which shall pay a small fee per year for two years, the first payment to be made within six months after the expert is in the field, and the second one year from that date. This association will have charge of the work in the county. The service will be free to every farmer in the county and should be applied to the man who is unable to send his children to the agriculture college. It gives him an opportunity to have the college brought to the boy and girl at his own farm. We believe that the work will re-

OVER QUARTER OF A CENTURY

Has Captain E. E. Pugh Been in the Life Saving Service.

PROMOTION IS DESERVED

Has Been Appointed Keeper of the Desirable Post at Ludington.

During His Residence Among Us He Has Won a Place in the Esteem of Our Citizens Which is Shown in Farewell Functions.

It is a source of much regret to Charlevoix citizens that Captain E. E. Pugh, of the local life saving crew, will leave us at the expiration of this week. Mingled, however, with the regret which we feel over the loss of the Captain and family, who have gained a place in our affections during their stay with us, is a feeling of pleasure that the government has seen fit to recognize the faithful services of Captain Pugh by appointing him to what is considered one of the most important stations in this district.

Captain Pugh has devoted more than a quarter of a century to the life saving service. His first enlistment was in the crew of the Manistee station, April 1, 1888, where he served one year, transferring in 1887 to Pentwater where he became a surfman, serving continuously until February 1, 1907, when he was promoted and appointed keeper of the South Manitou Island station where he made good. August 25, 1910, he was transferred to the keepership of the Charlevoix station, and is now in receipt of orders to report at, and take charge of the Ludington station, March 10.

Ludington is one of the best stations in the service, being considered the third in importance in this district. In addition to the regular life saving service the Captain will have charge of the weather signal service.

The Captain and family will leave here next Saturday, his household goods being shipped this week.

His departure from the Charlevoix station is being celebrated by the citizens of the station and the town.

A very large number of citizens, including the mayor, aldermen, and business men, as well as the surfmen of his crew, dropped in on the Captain at his quarters just before bedtime and kept him from turning in until sometime after midnight. Mrs. Pugh, being out of town, the Captain was keeping watch, and so was not prepared to serve the usual refreshments of ice cream and cake, but he did the next best thing by passing a basket of apples and water from the pumps.

City Attorney Kline, in his characteristic way, presented the Captain with an elegant Bible in behalf of the Men's Bible class and wished him Godspeed in his new field of activities.

will in wonderful improvement, and we appeal to residents of the county to interest themselves in this movement and help push the project.

For the purpose of subscribing as members, to form the organization and for the election of officers and such other business as may come before the people that day, a meeting has been called for Friday, March 14, 1913, at 10:00 a. m. at the court house, Charlevoix, Michigan.

Every banker in the county, the supervisors and clerks of the various townships, the superintendents of the public schools and the county school commissioner, every farmer, merchant, business man, and all persons interested in improved farm conditions and the financial prosperity in our county have been asked and should be present. The success of this movement depends on your presence. You are urged to remember the day and hour and help push on the great work. Will you help?

This call is respectfully issued by the Committee of Banks.

W. J. Rachow,
Temporary Chairman.

Seven Million Dollars.

In a statement on the annual output of the sugar factories of the state, Secretary Hathaway of the Michigan Sugar company, states that 1,150,000 tons of beets were sliced, $7,000,000 was paid to farmers and 250,000,000 pounds of sugar manufactured.

For This Section.

Annual Meeting Held in Grand Rapids Last Week
—Plans for Next Year.

The annual meeting of the executive committee of the Western Michigan Development Bureau was held at Grand Rapids last week. Sheriff Robbins attending from this county. Reports were heard and plans made for next year.

The amount raised last year for the development work was about $130,000, and of this the transportation companies contributed about $50,000. The transportation companies represented at the meeting signified their willingness to contribute for another year's campaign, except the Grand Rapids & Indiana, whose representatives did not have authority to make any pledge. On motion of Fisher A. Knott a committee will be appointed to visit the officers of the road in Pittsburg and present the matter.

For the campaign conducted last year there were sixteen contributing counties, but Ottawa, Montcalm, Mason and Osceola, who received their full share of the benefits, did not come across. It was decided to carry them along on the old basis until the county supervisors meet in April and then if they remain outside to treat them accordingly. The reports rendered showed that as reported by the county supervisors 3,600 new settlers had come into the bureau district in the last four years and 48 miles of good roads had been built.

MADE SMALLER

All American Currency to be Reduced One-Third in Size.

Preparations for completely changing the designs of all American currency and reducing the size of paper money by one-third, has been practically finished by the treasury department.

The design for the back of the note, created by Kenyon Cox, of New York, was submitted to Secretary MacVeagh, who accepted it upon condition that it is approved by the fine arts commission. "Simple and artistic" is the treasury department's characterization of the design, which consists of allegorical figures representing "America," "Peace," "Unity," "Labor" and "Commerce."

The treasury practically has finished a design for the face of the notes. A vignette of Washington will adorn the face of the one dollar note. The portraits for the other notes have not been decided upon.

"It's The Best Polish I Ever Used"

That's What Every One Says Who Tries

Black Silk Stove Polish

DON'T imagine for a moment that all brands of stove polish are the same. Don't get the idea that to keep a nice glossy shine on your stove you must black it every few days. It's not a question of frequency of application. It's a question of the stove polish you use.

Black Silk Stove Polish is so much better than other stove polishes that there is absolutely no comparison—it's in a class all by itself.

It makes a brilliant glossy shine that doesn't rub off and it lasts for weeks as long as any other shine. It makes old stoves look like new and lasts for weeks as long as any other shine.

Get a can and give it a trial. Try it on your parlor stove, your cook stove, or your gas range. If you do not find it the best stove polish you ever used, your dealer is authorized to refund your money. Black Silk Stove Polish has been made by the same formula and sold under one name for 20 years.

Here is what some of the ladies write us:

"I sent you for a can of Black Silk Stove Polish and found it so much better than any I had ever used that I asked my husband to order a supply. He did so, and is now selling it to everyone in the place your polish. I had no idea there could be such a difference in stove polishes."

"I was visiting friends and they used Black Silk Stove Polish on their stoves. It made the best shine I ever saw, and after blacking, the polish did not rub off. It is way ahead of any polish I have ever used."

Ask Your Dealer for Black Silk Stove Polish and refuse a counterfeit brand. You will find that the only way to get the best is to get the best. Black Silk Stove Polish is the only one that has no equal for use on automobiles.

Black Silk Stove Polish Works, Sterling, Ill.

Use Black Silk Stove Polish on all stoves, ranges, and gas heaters. It prevents rusting, keeps them bright and shiny, and makes them look like new. It is the best stove polish ever made. It is the only one that has no equal for use on automobiles.

Charlevoix Citizens Should Read and Heed This Advice.

Kidney trouble is dangerous and often fatal. Don't experiment with something new and untried.

Use a tested kidney remedy. Begin with Doan's Kidney Pills. Used in kidney troubles 50 years. Recommended here and everywhere.

A Charlevoix citizen's statement forms convincing proof. It's local testimony—it can be investigated.

Mrs. W. L. Cowan, 211 Clinton St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I do not hesitate to recommend Doan's Kidney Pills for I have derived good results from them. I was subject to severe headache and pains in my kidneys and was also annoyed by the kidney secretions. I used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at the Ivy Drug Store, and they brought me great relief."

Equal Suffrage Notes.

The Michigan Equal Suffrage association has sent out suggestions for the campaign in favor of the proposed amendment to the constitution granting suffrage to women.

Among other things it says: "We recommend that our former policy of keeping the campaign for woman suffrage in Michigan upon a sane dignified plane be strictly adhered to."

"I have never heard an argument against woman suffrage which might not have been urged with equal force against manhood suffrage," says Attorney General Light of Connecticut.

Former Governor Shafer of Colorado, newly elected United States senator from that state said recently, "Equal suffrage in my state has proved a splendid success. The influence of women in politics in Colorado has always been for good."

"Women in California are more conscientious about registering and voting than men," says Dr. Robert J. Burdette. "Old politicians are afraid of them but good citizens are delighted with them. These women are home-keeping women, too. They are gentle, refined, kind hearted, soft spoken, the dearest wives and sweetest sweethearts."

NOVEL LAKE CRAFT

Is Being Constructed for John O. Plank at Traverse City Iron Works.

A fifty foot gasoline boat which is being constructed at the Traverse City Iron Works for John O. Plank, to be used in carrying passengers and the mail between Fox Island and Charlevoix is rapidly nearing completion and is now ready to receive the outer planking. The craft will be a fifty footer with cabin and passenger accommodations forward and freight space aft. She will be equipped with a 25 horse power Wolverine motor with which she should be able to develop plenty of speed. Owing to the lack of harbor on Fox Island the boat will have to be kept on the shore and a novel attachment has been arranged for facilitating the moving of her. By using a drum and worm gear in the craft itself the boat will be drawn into and out of the water under her own power. A plank runway will be constructed with trucks so that it will make landing comparatively easy where heretofore it has meant the expenditure of much time and manual labor. Record Eagle.

CHAPTER III.
At Hopfield Manor.

MISS HOLLISTER'S summons lay on my desk the next morning and was of the briefest. I was requested to call at Hopfield Manor at 4 o'clock the following afternoon, being Thursday. A trap would meet me at Kato's, and it was suggested that I come prepared to spend the night, so that the condition of the lines might be discussed and any necessary changes planned during the evening. The note signed Octavia Hollister, was written in a flowing hand on a wholly impeccable note sheet stamped Hopfield Manor, Kato's.

Before taking the train I sought Wiggin by telephone at his office and at the Hare and Tortoise, where he held, but without learning anything as to his whereabouts. His office did not answer, but Wiggin's office had never been responsive to the telephone, so this was not significant. The more I considered his conduct during the recall of my visit to the Asolando the more I wondered, and in spite of my wish to ignore utterly Jewett's revelations as to Wiggin's summer abroad, I was forced to the conclusion that Jewett had not lied. I had known Wiggin long, and this was the first time that I had ever been conscious of any withholding of confidence on his part and on my own I had not merely confided all my hopes and aims to him, but I had leaned upon him often in my perplexities. There was, indeed, a kind of boyish compact between us that we should support each other through all difficulties. His reserve, his diffidence and sensitive nature, and it was wholly possible that if his affair with Cecilia Hollister had not prospered he had fled to his ranch there to wrestle in seclusion with his disappointment. My mind was busy with such speculations as I sped toward Kato's, where I found the trap from Hopfield Manor awaiting me.

"It's rather poor going over the hills; about five miles, sir," said the driver as we set off.

This was the first week in October. There was just zest enough in the air to make a top coat comfortable. The team of blacks spoke well for Miss Hollister's stable, and the liveried driver kept them moving steadily, but eased the pace as we rose on the frequent slopes to the shoulders of the pleasant Westchester hills. Early frosts had already wrought their miracle in the foliage, and the battle banners of winter's vanguard flashed along the horizon. I rejoiced that my business, vexatious enough in many ways, yet afforded me so charming an outing as this.

Presently we climbed a hill that shouldered its way well above its fellows and came out upon a broad ridge where we entered at once a wide gateway set in an old stone wall and struck off smartly along a fine bit of macadam. The house, the driver informed me, was a quarter of a mile from the gate. The way led through a wild woodland, in which elms and maples predominated, and before this had grown monotonous we came abruptly upon an Italian garden, beyond which rose the house. I knew it at once for one of Pepperton's sound performances. Pepperton is easily our best man in domestic Tudor, and the whole setting of Hopfield Manor—the sunken garden, the superb cypress, the billowing fields and woodlands beyond—all testified to a taste which no ignorant owner had thwarted. The house was Tudor, but in no servile sense. It was also Pepperton. I lifted my eyes with immediate professional interest to the chimneys on the roof. It occurred to me on the instant that I had never before been called to retouch any of Pepperton's work. Pepperton as much as I about due construction and an immense respect for Pepperton as my specializing in chimneys had been a subject of frequent chaffing between us. I anticipated with a chuckle the pleasure I should have later in telling him that at last one of his dues had required my services.

My good opinion of Miss Hollister did not dimish as I stepped within the broad hall. Houses have their own manner of speech, and Hopfield Manor spoke to all the senses in accents of taste and refinement. A servant took my bag and ushered me into a charming library. A fire smoldered lazily in the great fireplace; there was in the room the faintest scent of burnt wood, but the smoke rose in the flue on a perfectly mannerly fashion, and on thrusting in my hand I felt a good draft of air. I instinctively knelt on the hearth and peered up, but saw nothing unworkmanlike—Pepperton was not a fellow to leave obvious mistakes behind him. But possibly that was not one of the recalcitrant fireplaces I had been called to inspect, and I rose and was continuing my exjoyment of the beautiful room when I became conscious, by rather curious and mixed processes not wholly of the eye, that a young woman had drawn back the light portieres—they were dark brown, with borders of burnt orange—and stood gazing at me. She held the curtains apart—they made, indeed, a kind of frame for her, but as our eyes met she advanced at once and spoke my name.

She Advanced at Once and Spoke My Name.

"You are Mr. Ames. My aunt expected you. I regret to say that she is not in the house just now, but she will doubtless return for tea. I am her niece. Won't you sit down?"

As she found a seat for herself, I made hold to survey her with some particularity. She carried her fine height with beautiful dignity. She was a creature of grace, and it was a grace of strength, the suppleness and ease that mark our later outdoor American woman. She could do her nifties over those hills—I was sure of that. Her fine olive face, crowned with dark hair, veiled the impression I had gathered from Jewett, that she was a woman of cultivation. She had read the poets; Dante and Petrarch spoke from her eyes. Cecilia was no bad name for her; she suggested heavenly harmonies! And as for Jewett's story of Wiggin's infatuation, I was content.

"She was talking meanwhile of today and its buoyant air and of the tapestries hung in the woodlands in a voice deep with rare laments of old choirs.

"It's very quiet here. It doesn't seem possible that we are so near the city. My aunt chose the place with care, and she made no mistake about it. Yes, the house was built by Mr. Pepperton, but not for us. My aunt bought it of the estate of the gentleman who built it. This will be her first winter here."

Miss Hollister herself appeared. She greeted me without surprise and much as she might have spoken to my guest in her house, I had sometimes been treated as though I were the agent of a decorator's shop, or a delinquent plumber, by the people whom I served, but Miss Hollister and her niece established me upon a plane that was wholly social. I was made to feel that it was the most natural thing in the world for me to be there, having tea, with no business ahead of me but to be agreeable. The fact that I had come to correct the distemper of their dues was utterly negligible. I remembered with satisfaction that I had journeyed from town in a new business suit that made the best of my attenuated figure, and I will not deny that I felt at ease. Miss Hollister talked briskly as she made tea. "It is not necessary for you to take tea if you don't care for it," Mr. Ames," she said, as I rose and handed the first cup to Cecilia. "If you will touch the bell at your elbow you may have liquids of quite another sort."

"You are most generous, Miss Hollister. Tea will suffice for the moment. It is fitting that I should take it here, it having been a weakness for tea as well as curiosity and chance that threw me in your way at the Asolando."

"That altered—that preposterous hole to the wall!"

She put down her cup and faced me, continuing: "Mr. Ames, I will not deny that if it had not been for General Glendinning's cordial endorsement of you, and the further fact that I had met your late father, I should not have invited you to my house on the occasion to which you refer. My contempt for the Asolando and the things it stands for is beyond such language as a lady may use before the young. I fall back upon the privilege of my age to beg that you will hereafter give the Asolando a wide berth."

I laughed at her earnestness, but on turning toward Miss Cecilia I saw that she was placidly stirring her cup. It might be that one was not expected to manifest amusement in Miss Hollister's utterances, and I was anxious to adjust myself to the proper key in my intercourse, no matter how brief it might be, with this remarkable old lady.

In my embarrassment I rose and offered the broad and butter to Cecilia, who declined it. The austerity of her rejection rather unnerved me.

"I assure you, Miss Hollister, that I have no wish to become a habitue of the place," I said. "And yet you will pardon me if I repeat that, but for it, I should not now be enjoying the hospitality of Hopfield Manor."

She lifted her head from her cup and bowed, but I was immediately interested in the fact that her niece was speaking.

"I think Aunt Octavia is hard on the Asolando," she was saying. "Aunt Octavia is interested in the revival of romance, and romance without poetry seems to me wholly impossible."

"The age is decadent, and I know no better way of restoring the race to its ancient vim and energy than by sending men back to the crann and field or to sail the high seas in new armadas. The men of this age have become a lot of sordid shopkeepers, and to my moral sense the louting of cities is far more honorable than the creation of trusts and the manipulation of prices, though I cannot deny that but for my late father's zeal in destroying his competitors in the baby buggy business we might not now be enjoying the delicate fragrance of caravan tea."

"I assure you, Mr. Ames," said Cecilia, "that the Asolando is a very harmless place, and that as a matter of fact its aims are wholly consonant with those of Aunt Octavia. I myself served among the most delightful days of my life. There are times when I miss the Asolando."

"Mr. Ames," began Miss Octavia presently in her crisp, direct fashion which had the effect of leading me in my anxiety to appear ready with answers to take a flattering view of my own courage and resourcefulness. "Mr. Ames, are you equal to the feat of swimming a pond under a shattering fire from the castle?"

"I have every reason to think, I am Miss Hollister," I replied modestly.

"And if a while hand waved to you from the gridded window of the lonely tower, would you ride on indifferently or pause and thunder at the gate?"

"White hands have never waved to me, save occasionally, when I have gone riding in the Sixth avenue elevated, but it is my honest belief that my sword would promptly leave its scabbard if the hand ever waved from the tower."

My friends at the Hare and Tortoise would have heard this avowed with some surprise, for no man's life had ever been tamer than mine. I am by nature timid, and fall but a little short of being afraid of the dark. Prayers for deliverance from battle, murder and sudden death cannot be too strongly expressed for me. My answer had, however, pleased Miss Octavia, and she clasped her hands with pleasure.

"Cecilia," she cried, "something told me that afternoon at the Asolando that my belief in the potential seven was not ill placed, and now you see that in introducing myself to Mr. Ames at the seventh shop from Fifth avenue, I was led to a meeting with a gentleman I had been undetermined to know."

As we talked further a servant appeared and laid fresh logs across the still smoldering fire. This I thought would suggest to Miss Hollister the professional character of my visit, but the fire kindled readily, the smoke rose freely in the flue, and Miss Hollister paid no attention to it. The merits of chain armor, I think it was, that held us for half an hour, Cecilia and I listening with respect to what, in my ignorance, seemed a remarkable fund of knowledge on this recalcitrant subject.

"We dine at 7, Mr. Ames, and you may amuse yourself as you like until that hour. Cecilia, you may order dinner in the gun room tonight."

"Certainly, Aunt Octavia."

Once more I glanced at the girl, hoping that some glimmer in her eyes would set me right and establish a common understanding and sympathy between us, but she was moving out of the room at her aunt's side. The man who had tended the fire met me in the hall and, conducting me to my room, suggested various offices that he was ready to perform for my comfort. The house faced south, and my windows, midway of the east wing, afforded a fine view of the hills. The room was large enough for a chamber of state, and its furniture was massive. A four poster invited to luxurious repose; half a dozen etchings by famous artists—Parrish and Van Elsen among them—hung upon the walls.

My bag had been opened and my things put out, so that there being more than an hour to pass before I need dress for dinner, I went below and explored the garden and wandered off along a winding path that stole with charming furtiveness toward a venerable orchard of gnarled apple trees. From the height thus gained I looked down upon the house, and caught a glimpse beyond it of one of the chain of lakes, on which the western sun glinted goldenly. Thus seeing the house from a new angle I was impressed as I had not been at first by its size. It was a huge establishment, and I thought with envy of Pepperton, to whom such ample commissions were not rare. Pepperton, I recalled a little bitterly, had arrived, whereas I, who had enjoyed exactly his own training for the architect's profession, had failed at it and been obliged to turn my hand to the doctoring of chimneys. But as I reflected upon the odd circumstances of my being there my spirit rose. Miss Hollister was beyond question a singular person, but her whims were amusing. I felt that she was less cryptic than her niece, and the thought of Cecilia drove me back upon Jewett's story of Wiggin's interest in that quarter. I resolved to write to Wiggin when I got back to town the next day and advise him roundly for running off without so much as goodby. That, most emphatically, was not like dear old Wiggin.

wagons and an occasional motorcar had passed during my reverie. The sloping pasture was rough and frequently sent me along at a trot. The wall that marked the boundary at the roadside was hidden by a tangle of raspberry bushes, and my foot, turning on a stone concealed in the wild grasses, I fell clumsily and rolled a dozen yards into a tangle of the berry bushes. As I picked myself up I heard voices in the road, but should have thought nothing of it had I not seen through a break in the vines and almost within reach of my hand Cecilia Hollister talking earnestly to some one not yet disclosed. She was batless, but had hung a golf cape over her shoulders. The scarlet lining of the hood turned up about her noble head, an effective setting for her noble head. "Oh, I can't tell you! I can't help you! I mustn't even appear to give you any advantage. I went into it with my eyes open, and I'm in home bound not to tell you anything. You have said nothing—nothing, remember that. There is absolutely nothing between us."

"But I must say everything. I refuse to be blinded by these absurd restrictions, whatever they are. It's not fair. It's inviting me into a game where the cards are not all on the table. I've come to make an end of it."

My hands had suffered by contact with the berries and I had been pinning them to them with my handkerchief, but I fell back upon the slope in my astonishment at this colloquy. Cecilia Hollister I had seen plainly enough. (Continued on page 6)

To Our Friends and Neighbors

You know us. You know we would not—that we could not afford to go back on our word. Nor can you afford to ignore this money-back-if-not-satisfied offer on this splendid laxative.

We honestly believe we have the best bowel remedy ever made—the most pleasant-to-take, most permanently beneficial laxative for relief from the misery and dangers arising from constipation.

We wouldn't say this if we didn't believe it to be true. We wouldn't risk our reputation by making such statements did we not feel sure you would find them true.

Our faith is built both on the knowledge of what Rexall Orderlies are made of and on observation of very many severe cases in which they have proven their merit.

Try them at Our Risk

If they do not abundantly prove their merit with you also—if you are not entirely satisfied with them—we will refund your money—and we will do that on your mere say-so. We don't ask you to risk a penny. Isn't that fair?

Just let the bowels fail in properly doing their work—just let their action be delayed and incomplete and the entire system and every other organ suffers. Wastes that

CAUTION: Please bear in mind that Rexall Orderlies are not sold by all drug-gists. You can buy Rexall Orderlies only at The Rexall Stores.

TUESDAY EVENING MARCH ELEVENTH

Date of The Next Number of Charlevoix Citizen's Lecture Course.

Edward Amherst Oil, The Purposeful Orator, Will be The Attraction of The Evening.

Next Tuesday evening is the date for the next number of the Citizen's Lecture course, the attraction being Edward Amherst Oil, "The Purposeful Orator."

Mr. Oil has been on the lecture platform for a number of years and wherever he has appeared the management has been urged to place him on the course for the next year by their patrons.

This lecture on "Sour Grapes," which he has delivered nearly two thousand times, will probably be the subject of his lecture here, answers many interesting questions on the ethics of biology and is described as not only humorous and highly entertaining but full of instruction.

To show some of the after effects of Oil's lecture wherever he has delivered his lecture on "Sour Grapes," the sale of the book has been enormous until now it is in the 25,000 class.

Tickets will be on sale at the Central Drug Store Monday.

Headaches, biliousness, nervousness and other tormenting and serious ailments are common when the bowels fail to act daily as nature intended. All this may be avoided, if you will accept our advice.

Rexall Orderlies

These just like candy. They are soothing and easy in action. They do not cause griping, nausea, purging or excessive looseness. They tend to tone and strengthen intestinal nerves and muscles. They promptly relieve constipation and help to permanently overcome it.

Rexall Orderlies promote better spirits and better health. In all of these things they are vastly superior to old-fashioned, harsh salts and other purgatives, which are not only unpleasant to take but which usually leave the bowels in worse condition than before. We particularly recommend Rexall Orderlies for children, aged and delicate persons.

Rexall Orderlies come in velvet-pocket tin boxes. 12 tablets, 10c; 30 tablets, 25c; 80 tablets, 50c.

A CIVIC COMMISSION.

Leading Citizens of San Antonio to Investigate.

The idea of a civic commission consisting of the leading men of various lines of endeavor in San Antonio appointed by the mayor and serving without pay to investigate problems which may arise and advise the city council thereon was advanced at the luncheon given by the Chamber of Commerce. There were present 150 members of that body present, with whom this projected commission found favor, and it is deemed probable that when the idea has been fully elaborated and worked out it will be presented to the new city administration with a request for its cooperation.

Such a commission, it was suggested, could take up the river problem, the street problem, the city plan problem and the various others, bringing to them expert and careful attention, devoting time and experiment, and for all suggestions made select the best, to discuss it and recommend to the council its adoption.

UTE JOHN

He Was a White Boy Brought Up by Indians

By MILLARD MALTBY

A man riding on horseback over that region lying west of the Missouri river called "the plains," with a curly headed boy about three years old before him, coming to an Indian village dismounted and carrying the child to the chief said to him:

"I'd like you to take this little fellow and bring him up as an Indian. He's a sure he stays an Indian. He's got enough money to buy firewater with to last you a long while. Is it a bargain?" The chief told the visitor that he would take the boy, but would make better use of the money than to spend it for firewater. Then the man rode away muttering to himself: "Heck! that youngster's pretty well lost. He's too young to know who he is, and if he ever joins the whites they can't find out who he is neither. Lucky I caught sight of this thing," taking a gold locket and chain from his pocket: "It might have identified him." He opened the locket and found its contents a tiny lock of auburn hair. Three letters were cut inside the locket—M. E. W. "That would have been a dead give away," he continued, "and if I hadn't caught a glimpse of the chain I'd never have seen the locket."

The chief with whom he had made the bargain, turned the child over to his squaw, who proceeded to take off the face linen in which he was clothed with a view to putting them away for future use, while the boy was to run about naked. She was admiring an undergarment edged with lace when her eye caught sight of some letters embroidered upon it. She did not know what they meant, but had a glimmering in her stupid brain that the clothes bearing the hieroglyphics might be of some value at some future time.

As the child grew older it was found that "Pajoose" would not suffice for his name and one was given him that the Indians had heard of another John. John grew among the tribe to be four years old, being a mainly boy adopted by the chief and named after his successor. He was not old enough to know the difference between a white skin and a red skin and that the chief and his squaw were not his father and mother. Then the squaw one day showed him his baby clothes and told him a white man had brought him to the tribe.

THE CHIEF TOLD THE VISITOR THAT HE WOULD TAKE THE BOY

The boy was not surprised. Indeed for some time the instincts of his race had been having this effect, and he felt that he should have a place among the whites.

It was not long after this that the Indians broke loose from their reservation and in a fight with United States troops were defeated and John was captured by the Indians. When all were released the boy wished to go with them, but the officer in command questioned him and, learning the circumstances of his introduction among the Indians, persuaded him to remain with his own race.

At this time John knew not a word of any language except that of the tribe to which he belonged—the Utes—and was questioned through an interpreter, he possessed all the refinement of an Indian, having been brought up in that school, and very little was gained from him. When his squaw foster mother learned that he was to remain with his own people she sent him his baby clothes. They made but a small parcel and when given to John attracted no attention. He put them away without saying anything about them.

Edith Trowbridge, the daughter of one of the captains serving at the fort was a black-eyed little girl of twelve. Notwithstanding the fact that Ute John had been brought up as a son of the forest, his skin was fairer than Edith's, and while her hair was like the raven, his was like the robin. The two were permitted to be companions for some two years, when one of those periodic changes which are part of army routine came about. The command was transferred to a fort in the middle west. The colonel had meanwhile been considering what to do with John, and the officers of his command, who respected the boy as a protégé, made up a purse to give him a couple of years' schooling, the colonel heading the subscription.

Before parting with Edith Trowbridge she and John had a boy and a girl lovers' interview, which was especially painful to both and would probably have been painful to Edith's parents had they known anything about it. John never told of it himself, and as for the girl, being still a child, she was not likely to confess a childish love.

When Ute John had had a couple of years' schooling—he proved an extraordinary scholar—he was old enough to think for himself and a career in the line of a white citizen of the United States. He desired to go to college, but this was not to be considered unless he paid his own way. It was then that the idea of trying to discover his identity, which had often occurred to him, took a firm hold, and spreading his baby clothes, which he had carefully preserved, on a table before him, he proceeded to examine them and to think. He was at once struck with the fine texture of their fabric and with the fact that the child who had worn them must have been born of parents among the upper classes. And he now realized for the first time the letters (C. L. W.) embroidered on them must be the initials of his own name. He regretted that he had kept the secret of these clothes, for he now knew that if he had given them to those interested in him they might by this time have discovered his identity.

He was now sufficiently developed to act intelligently. He took the clothes to an attorney to whom he told the story given him by his squaw foster mother of his introduction to the Ute Indians; namely, that he had been brought to the chief by a white man who had paid the former to keep him and not let him get back to civilization. The lawyer agreed to open an investigation at his own expense by advertising the story in a number of news papers.

Since nothing came of the advertisement, John entered college resolved to pay his way by attaining scholarships and earning money by work. He finished his first year of study when the lawyer who had taken his case sent for him and told him that he had heard from the advertisement, which he had kept inserting from time to time. A man named Markland had replied to it, saying that he had long been seeking a child who had been stolen about the time John was taken to the Indians. This person had called at the attorney's office and when he saw the baby clothes marked C. L. W. at once exclaimed:

"Found!" He told the following story: Cutbert Whitridge, a wealthy gentleman and his wife for years after their marriage had no child. Then a son was born to them whom they named Charles Louis. Mrs. Whitridge died when the boy was not quite three years old and shortly after her death the boy disappeared. Every effort was made to trace him without avail. Since no demand for ransom was made it was supposed that the child had either fallen to his death or been taken by a thief who had adopted him. His father, Cutbert Whitridge, had made a will naming Edward Markland executor, leaving his property to his son provided he appeared to claim it within twenty years. After that it was to go to the testator's brother. This brother, Ambrose Whitridge, after Cutbert's death, had striven to have the will set aside, the property, notwithstanding a legal contest for fifteen years, but meeting repeated defeats. The suit had been expensive to defend but the estate was very valuable.

The John, or Charles Louis, Whitridge, finding himself heir to a fortune, learned his sweetheart's address and wrote her of his changed condition. He and his counsel believed that his uncle had stolen, or employed some one to steal, him when a child and take him west and lose him among the Indians. Louis Whitridge being desirous to punish his uncle, if guilty, after consultation with his counsel, employed a detective to endeavor to get evidence against him. This was also necessary since the uncle would not acknowledge him as heir to his property. The detective bribed a housemaid to admit him to the premises when her master was away, and he found in a desk a letter containing a lock of the boy's hair. "The John is home—send me the balance." No name was signed to the letter. The lock contained a lock of auburn hair, and the letters M. E. W. were engraved within it. Louis' mother's hair was the exact color of this lock and her name was Mary Elizabeth. In this discovery there was evidence to show that Ambrose Whitridge had been instrumental in the abduction of the child who stood between him and a fortune and had hired a man to lose him to the world. Louis, acting on the advice of his lawyer, invited his uncle to meet him for a conference in the attorney's office for the purpose of a compromise. When Ambrose Whitridge arrived he learned that the compromise intended was his signing of all claim to the disputed property of being prosecuted criminally for abduction. He chose the former.

Before returning to college Louis Whitridge visited the military station where Captain—now Lieutenant—Edith Trowbridge served and met his sweetheart, whom he had not seen for several years. Since the girl had grown almost constant to her "Ute John," the meeting was a happy one. She consented to let him say good-bye to her father, and his consent was given on condition that he should not come of age until it was found that he had been adopted from college.

Over President's Veto.

Congress, during its last days, passed the Kenyon-Webb bill over President Taft's veto. The bill is the one passed a few weeks ago prohibiting the shipment of liquor into dry states, and is now a law.
President Taft in his veto declared the bill unconstitutional. It will now be tested in the courts.
This is the first time in fifteen years that Congress has passed a bill over the president's veto.

made all and it was good that he would stultify himself and create an imperfect man subject to sin, sickness and death? Is it not more just and reasonable to think that the two histories were written by minds of different spiritual understanding? And indeed this is borne out by Paul in Hebrews. Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of thing that do appear.

Is it not proper to consider that the "reflection of God" must be the reflection of all the qualities of God, which are, life, truth, love, intelligence, etc., until they fill every need for his child? This spiritual man which God created and to whom he gave "dominion over all" exists in the consciousness of every man, and in proportion as each one realizes his true birthright of sonship of God and denies the claims of matter, in this proportion he can overcome by the power of God any error which attacks him. The human man expresses this reflection when the God qualities are thus made manifest in him. Man has tried through scholastic theology to reach God through matter all down the ages, but he is no nearer now than at the creation.

Christian Science teaches that God is personal in an infinite sense, but not in a corporeal sense. If the latter were true how could he be omnipotent? There is absolutely nothing in the teaching of Christian Science to warrant the statement that any woman could bear a child in virginity. A statement of that kind never came from a Christian Scientist however much he claimed to be such.

Mrs. Eddy has never taught that Jesus the human did not die. On page 19 of Science and Health she says, "The meek demonstrator of good, the highest instructor and friend of man, met his earthly fate alone with his God." Page 40— "Was it just for Jesus to suffer? No; but it was inevitable, for not otherwise could he show us the way and power of Truth." Page 38— "The eternal Christ his spiritual selfhood never suffered." Our critic must have read the Scriptures to little purpose if he fails to recognize the strong distinction the Master placed between his human self Jesus and the spiritual Christ. Of the first he said, "I can mine own self do nothing." Of the latter, which dwelleth in him, "He doeth the works," and again, "Whoever shall do the will of the Father who is in heaven, there is none good but God." But of the Christ he said, "I and my Father are one."

Jesus had learned his great lesson of "dominion" over matter as we show in his many works of healing, stilling the waves, walking on the water, etc., and he was last to show the mightiest work of all in raising the dead. The deathless life of the true man does not abide in the tomb as the stone at the tomb was any more of an obstacle for spirit than stilling the storm?

(Jesus) did life's work aright, not only in justice to himself, but in mercy to mortals—to show them how to do things but not to do it for them, or relieve them of a single responsibility, S. & H., p. 18. This accords with the Scripture, "If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." Thus the person who "does" not care anything for Christian Science, and pays no attention to Jesus words—"If ye love me, keep my commandments"—but goes to it for the physical healing only, should not expect to receive much benefit, for it is the theology of Jesus Christ that heals.

No one questions that there are occasional cures by faith healing and other means, but no other system of mind or prayer healing has ever had a known principle operative at all times, and in all places since the time of Jesus Christ.

The Rev. Quinton Walker begins his sermon by saying that he does not wish to deal in personalities at all, and immediately speaks of "those whom he styles 'friends' as 'Eddies'." The fact is, there is no such class of people any more than there is a class called "Wesleyites." Is the gentleman ignorant on these points, or is it a desire to call names?

The reference to Mrs. Eddy as a "dictator" is amusing to those who know her well, both in and out of Christian Science, and it comes with rather bad grace from the pastor of a denomination that has been proverbial in its "thou shalt" and "shalt not" to its members in connection with various amusements innocent in themselves. Mrs. Eddy was never known to dictate to her followers. They were shown the right path and the results of straying from it, and left to work their own problems.

No one will dispute the faith healing experience in the Walker family, such instances occur from time to time. The only strange thing about it is why is not the Rev. Quinton Walker doing these works now? The Master whom he professes in follow has certainly made the demand as strong on this point, that he cannot mistake it. If Christian Science is such a "fake" why is it that during the last few years so many of the clergy, the physicians, the lawyers, the business men, and the working classes of the large cities, are flocking to the churches regularly, Sunday and Wednesday. Does not the fact that they are flocking to the churches, and are not he reading some of the old sermons of years ago.

He says, "Christian Scientists" are not willing to go out into the world and make bad men good." I will make the assertion that Christian Science heals more sin stained mortals who STAY HEALED than any other denomination. Christian Science whosoever one and all, but it does no proselytizing.

While "comparisons are odious" I will state our critic's misapprehension by relating an incident which came under my observation a few years ago. A pretty young girl (an actress) had moved into some quarters not far from one of the large M. E. Churches. The wife was taken down with "grippe" and the husband was out of work, two or three small children composed the family. The husband went to the pastor to ask him to go and see his wife, but he said he had no time, nor did he intend to send any one, but sent him of the man went to the Christian Science reading room, which was also near by and stated his needs. He was given the address of a Christian Scientist some distance away, and called on him for help. The Christian Scientist went with him and took care of the case for two days, and the woman was healed and able to do her work.

We are told that "Christian Scientists are not students of the Bible, they do not read up the latest thoughts of Science on the Bible." It is admitted by opponents of Christian Science that its followers are the closest students of the Bible of any class of people. Jesus once said to his followers, "The words which I speak unto you they are spirit and they are truth." This is the teaching in which Christian Scientists believe, and trust and follow, and by obedience to which they are able to do their works. With Paul, they believe that the "letter killeth but the spirit giveth life."

The Rev. Quinton Walker claims to have studied Christian Science works, and he says, "I think I see a beautiful landscape. Mary Baker Glover Eddy says you lie." On page 36 of Miscellaneous Writings, she says, "Even the human conception of beauty, grandeur and utility, is something that defies a sneer. It is more than imagination. It is next to divine beauty and the grandeur of Spirit. It lives with our earth-like, and is the subjective state of high thought. The atmosphere of mortal mind constitutes our mortal environment. What mortals hear, see, feel, taste, smell, constitutes their present earth and heavens." To take all earth's beauty into one grasp of vanity—and label beauty nothing, is ignorantly to caricature God's creation; which is unjust to human sense, and to the divine realm. In our immature sense of spiritual things, let us say of the beauties of the sensuous universe, "I love your promise; and shall know, something, the spiritual reality and substance of form, light, and color, of what I now through you discern dimly; and knowing this, I shall be satisfied."

Christian Science teaches that the material senses are unreal to God and the spiritual man, and consequently cannot be depended upon for our problem of life eternal; we are living in eternity now. It is so easy to teach that these material senses a pain was not a pain, or that a flower or tree was not what they seemed. On page 161 of Science and Health we read, "Sickness is neither imaginary nor unreal—that is to the frictional false sense of the patient. It is more than fancy for it is solid conviction." Will the gentleman tell us how it can be so—what is to be gained by misrepresentation?

With reference to accidents, the statement when taken as given by the author of "Science and Health" is perfectly logical. "There are no accidents in the divine mind," for in the realm of Spirit nothing inharmonious can enter, and it is the realization of man's true self and relation to God that enables one to overcome the sense of suffering, but if in human sense one meets with an accident of so serious a nature that the pain cannot be overcome at once, it is a case of "suffer it to be so now," using the hypodermic for temporary relief; not that Christian Science, itself is important, but that the human is weak.

The name "Christian Science" as applied to the religion founded by Mrs. Eddy has come to stay, and this name will go down in history, regardless of the clergyman's pastime in calling names. It was called "Science" because of implicit faith in factious, not part but all of the precepts of Jesus the Christ. It was called "Science" because it demonstrated what has never been done since the time of the Master—a perfect rule for healing sickness and sin, which when obeyed in its fullness never failed. Can the Rev. Quinton Walker show greater Christianity in his own church?

The gentleman quotes very freely from Science and Health, and yet makes the statement that Christian Science teaches there is no evil in the world. There are hundreds of warnings like the following in the text-book, against sin. P. 5 "Sorrow for wrong doing is but one step towards reform and the very easiest step." P. 101 "A corrupt mind is manifested in a corrupt body. Hatred, envy, and dishonesty, make a man sick; and neither material medicine nor Mind can help him permanently even in body, unless they make him better morally." P. 327 "The way in escape the misery of sin is to cease sinning."

Mr. Walker refers to two deaths which occurred under Christian Science treatment in your city, but does not mention the hundreds of deaths which occur yearly under medical treatment. He says the doctor states that "he had been called in time he might have saved the child." No physician will honestly say that he could have healed any case. Why were not the many who died under medicine healed? It is but just to state, (which Mr. Walker did not do) that the doctor said, "But medical science SOMETIMES fails."

In connection with this it may be proper to show some statistics from New York City for the year 1912. In that one year there were 1715 deaths from diphtheria; 953 from scarlet fever; all children under 15 years of age and under doctors care. The report further shows that in 1911 27,111 children under the age of fifteen died in New York City under medical treatment. The New York World prepared a list of all cases of children who died under Christian Science treatment in the entire United States, and found the number to be thirty-two.

In view of more than fifty years' experience, and the fact that the highest medical authority in this country is not inharmonious with the statement when taken as given by the American Medical Association, at the annual meeting of the great body in Atlantic City, said, "At the present time our knowledge of vaccines is extremely limited and they are very dangerous and wicked weapons to play with. A life can be snatched in forty seconds by the improper use of vaccines." And yet Christian Scientists are denounced because they prefer to rely on God rather than on these dangerous and wicked weapons."

As the Rev. B. Aitchison claims the "distinction of being the cause of the wholesale attack upon Christianity by the clergy of your city, he should feel signally honored by its results. It is written that on one occasion, the great Master spoke on this wise, "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corner of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, they have their reward."

We are told that "Christian Scientists deny the personality of God, in his message of 1901 to the Mother Church, Mrs. Eddy says: 'We understand that God is personal in a scientific sense, but is not corporeal nor anthropomorphic. We understand that God is not infinite, He is the Infinite Person, but not three persons in one Person.' Christian Scientists are Theists and Monotheists. Those who misjudge us because we understand that God is the Infinite One instead of three should be able to explain God's personality rationally."

His criticism "on matter" has already been answered in previous paragraphs, and I will only stop to add that such eminent physical scientists as Prof. Daniel of Edinburgh School of Medicine, Prof. Taft of Cambridge University, Prof. Woodhull of Columbia University, Prof. Barker, University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Oswald of Lehigh University; Prof. Allen, Hunter Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer, all deny the reality of matter. Sir Wm. Ramsay in his "Cities of St. Paul" says: "There is nothing real but spirit." Many other authorities support Mrs. Eddy's position of the unreality of matter.

When it is understood that Mrs. Eddy is not teaching from the standpoint of matter but of spirit, and that her references to matter and material conditions are but concessions to, and recognition of the human sense of things; the statements made concerning matter (the spiritual man created by God, and of sin and disease as unreal because not created by God, will be clear.

Christian Science teaches that to God there is no hereditary ending, because He is in the infinite. The word "ending" is employed to signify the ONLY, that is, the eternal verity and unity of God and man including the universe." S. & H., p. 502.

Matter is co-existent with God because he is God's thought. His reflection. How could it be otherwise? The reference to the dual nature of Jesus Christ has been fully explained in a previous paragraph, and if we are to believe Jesus' own words, it should be clear to all. The reference to divine Science as the Holy Comforter, is neither illogical nor "blasphemous" when understood. Jesus said to his followers, "I (the Christ) will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you.—Lo! I am with you always." Christian Scientists understand this to mean that when man becomes spiritual enough to realize his relation to God as the reflection, and his birthright of dominion over the carnal nature, that the Christ or divine comforter has already come into his consciousness, and he is at peace knowing that the omnipotent arms of divine love are about him. Is not this more reasonable than to think that the human Jesus would return to the world? How could he be made manifest to the entire world in a corporeal sense, and what would be accomplished with the already?

The gentleman is disturbed that "Christian Science does not accept the scientific vision of 'miracles' as applied to Jesus' mighty works." Christian Science, however, honors him more than any other theology because it accords him the full understanding of man's relation to God, by which understanding all his works were divinely natural, demonstrating beyond and even the birthright of "dominion" given him at the creation.

Our reverend critic talks very glibly about being "honest in every word" of his second sermon, and forthwith charges Christian Science with a statement of his own composition. Jesus never died. Being asked for his authority he gave a page number, and being asked if he was quoting from the book replied, "that he did not have the book but had written it down." Is a matter of fact the statement does not appear in the book. This is the teaching of a man who claims to stand between God and his people. Let the people draw their own conclusions.

The criticism is made that because Christian Science teaches "God is all" and God is good, therefore "all is good." I submit to the honest thinker that this position is correct when understood. The Bible states that God saw all that he made and he held it was very good. It also states that God made all that was made. Now where does the gentleman stand, with the Bible or with his opposition to his understanding of Christian Science, regardless of the Bible? On the full understanding of the Bible that God created nothing but good is the Christian Science position that sin, sickness and death, and all evil are unreal to God and the perfect man and can be destroyed by the power of God today when man is spiritual enough to reflect God even in earth.

A "personal devil" seems to be something of which our critic is fond. Has he ever seen one? Will he tell us how it would be possible to cast out seven conventional devils from Mary Magdalene? Is it not more reasonable to believe that these evil thoughts which are constantly attacking each one of us, and from which we can be delivered only by divine help?

Very truly yours,

TRUANCY LAW OF MICHIGAN

Plain Compilation of the Law Governing Governing Compulsory Attendance.

SIX EXCEPTIONS ARE MADE

Duties and Powers of Truant Officers Fully Explained.

Different Steps Which Must be Taken by Officials in Enforcement of the Law—Other Important Points.

1. The truancy law requires all children from the time they are seven years old until they become sixteen years old to be in regular and consecutive attendance at the public schools unless exempt as provided by the statute.

2. Six exceptions of compulsory attendance are made:

(a) Any child who is being taught in a private or parochial school in the branches usually taught in the public schools or who upon completion of the work in said school shall present evidence to the commissioner of schools or superintendent of schools that he has completed sufficient work to entitle him to the eighth grade diploma;

(b) Any child who has received an eighth grade diploma from the public schools;

(c) Any child physically unable to attend school. The truant officer must investigate such cases and he may employ a competent physician to determine the facts, and in such cases the county or district would bear the expense;

(d) Children over fourteen years of age whose services are essential to the support of their parents may be excused by the county commissioner or city superintendent on recommendation of the board of education;

(e) Children under nine years of age who do not reside within two and one-half miles of school;

(f) Any child twelve to fourteen years of age, while in attendance at confirmation classes conducted for a period of not less than five months in either of said years.

3. The law provides that in graded school districts the board of education shall appoint one or more truant officers and fix their compensation.

All truant officers have the power of a deputy sheriff.

4. The truant officers in cities and villages act under the direction of the superintendent of schools, and the superintendent of schools is therefore responsible for the enforcement of the law.

(c) It is the duty of the truant officer when notified of violation of this law to investigate all such cases, and if the children are not exempt according to its provisions he must immediately proceed to serve his notices to enforce the law.

13. Sec. 4. (b) If any parent fails to send his child to school according to law the truant officer must upon notice thereof, and within twenty-four hours thereafter, give formal written notice in person or by registered mail that the child must present himself at the public school on the day following the receipt of such notice, and the truant officer must at the same time notify the teacher, superintendent or commissioner of the fact of formal notice, and it is their duty to notify the truant officer of failure on the part of parents to comply with the notice.

14. The truant officer after having given formal notice must determine whether the notice has been complied with, or if not he must within three days after having knowledge of that fact make a complaint against the parent before a justice of the peace in the city, village or township or adjoining township or city in such county, and the justice must issue his warrant and proceed to hear and determine the case.

15. According to division (b) of section 3 any person convicted of failure to comply with this law is guilty of misdemeanor and the justice must inflict the penalty of the law, which is a fine of not less than five dollars or more than fifty dollars, or imprisonment in the county jail for less than two nor more than ninety days, or both such fine and imprisonment. It will be noted that this is the punishment, and that justices of the peace have no discretion in the case of conviction. The law says the person shall be fined or imprisoned, or in any other way interfere with the proper execution of this law.

16. The machinery of the law in villages, annexed up is as follows:

(a) The director must furnish the census list;

(b) The teacher must compare the census or enrollment and report to the superintendent;

(c) The superintendent notifies the truant officer;

(d) The truant officer investigates the case and if children are not exempt serves formal notice;

(e) Teacher notifies the truant officer of failure to comply with notice;

(f) Truant officer within three days makes complaint and secures warrant;

(g) Settlement in court.

Wins First Round.

In a counter action in ex-Congressman Dodds suit for libel against H. M. Gould of the Isabella County Enterprise, Mr. Gould brought demurrer proceedings claiming that there were not sufficient grounds in Mr. Dodds' declaration of libel to warrant a trial of the case. This demurrer action was argued before Judge Davis of the Ionia circuit, the judge overruling the demurrer of Mr. Gould. Now unless appeal is taken from this decision the libel case will probably be heard soon on its merits.

THE P. M. PROBE TO BE THOROUGH

Lieutenant Governor Ross Asks Aid of Board of Commerce.

Requests Them to Furnish Him With Data to Assist in the Work.

Secretary Hampton of the Board of Commerce has received the following letter from Lieutenant Governor Ross which is self explanatory. Anyone having information along the lines desired is invited to communicate with Mr. Hampton. The letter follows:

"As you may know, the legislature is conducting an inquiry into the affairs of the Pere Marquette railroad company. The purposes of this investigation are to disclose those things in its organization and management which need correcting in order that it may take its proper place in furnishing to the people of Michigan efficient service. The committee is investigating the service given by the company to the shippers and traveling public of Michigan, the physical condition of the property, the organization and manipulation of the company's affairs.

"We wish you would arrange to furnish us from your town or organization in as concise form as possible a report showing specific instances and dates bearing upon any and all of those questions, particularly where the service has resulted in unnecessary loss or delay, these statements to be in the form of an affidavit.

"If you prefer to have one or two witnesses who know the facts we will take their testimony before the committee at Lansing, the date of their appearance to be arranged before they come here. We are informed that the service has improved under the receivership; for that reason we would like to have the proof show the present condition as well as the past.

"You can readily understand in view of the mass of testimony to be taken that these matters must be given to us in as concise form as possible; otherwise their force will undoubtedly be lost.

"We are sending a similar letter to all of the principal shipping points on the lines of the Pere Marquette in Michigan.

"Please let us know promptly if you will undertake to furnish this to us and as to when it will be ready.

"John Q. Ross, Chairman."

COMMISSION FORM FOR COUNTIES TWENTY-FOUR YEARS OLD

Bill Now Pending Before Legislature to Change Government of Counties.

Would Abolish Board of Supervisors—In Favor of Three Man Commission.

A bill is pending in the Michigan legislature that provides for commission form of government in all counties in the state. If it should pass and become a law, a three-man commission will take the place of the present board of supervisors. The bill sets forth the plan to have this commission take entire charge of the county business, to legislate and administer the county's affairs and such other duties as now come within the province of the board of supervisors. This board of county commissioners are to be elected at large, so the bill says, and the supervisor system will be abolished. The introduction of this system of managing the county would have the same effect as the proposed commission plan of government for cities serving to destroy the democratic principle of representation; but there is grave doubt regarding the constitutionality of this bill, as well as the home rule bill for cities. Section 2 of article 8 of the constitution provides that there shall be elected biennially, a sheriff, treasurer, register of deeds and prosecuting attorney, and it would appear that the intent of the pending bill is in conflict with this provision.

ADDED TO FLEET

House of David Has Purchased Another Boat for Lumber Carrying.

The House of David has added another vessel to its fleet of boats which it operates in the summer time on the lake. The colony has purchased the steamer Minnie M. of Sault Ste. Marie. She is of 205 net tonnage, 133 feet long and 36 feet wide. The boat will be used in transporting lumber from High Island, the northern colony of the Israelites, to Benton Harbor.

Will Banquet Road Builders.

The business men of Traverse City have decided to make the big road meeting scheduled by the state highway department for that place for March 13 and 14, a memorable event, at least to those who attend, so they are arranging for a banquet in honor of the road builders. This banquet will occur at the close of the first day and will be followed by speeches from those men who are making Western Michigan famous because of the amount of highway improving going on.

Easter Dinner at Hotel Elston.

Easter Sunday dinner at Hotel Elston will be 50c. Please reserve your table at once, on account of the demand for seats already reserved. On and after this date all meals will be 50c. Sunday dinner, March 16, at 30c, will be the last at this price.—Adv.

Mrs. Stanley Wildern Died at Petoskey
Early This Morning.

Leaves Husband, Parents and Two Children—
Burial at Petoskey.

Mrs. Stanley Wildern died at the Petoskey hospital this morning after an illness of about two months. Lottie LaLonde was born in May 1888, and at the time of her death was 24 years old. Most of her life was spent in Boyne City and vicinity. In October, 1910, she was married to Stanley Wildern and the following spring they removed to this city where Mr. Wildern engaged in business.

Early in the winter she took a trip to points in Ohio, and on her return was taken ill, gradually growing worse until she was taken to the Petoskey hospital, where all that medical skill could do, was done for her without avail.

She leaves besides her husband, her twin babies, 14 months old, her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Richard LaLonde and uncle, Joe LaLonde, all of this city.

The funeral will be held Friday afternoon from the residence of O. A. Porter of Petoskey. Interment in that city. Mrs. Wildern was a most highly esteemed lady and the family has the sympathy of the entire community in their sad bereavement.

TRAPPED BY SNOW BANK

Miss Edith Boyle Loses Her Left Leg
by Railroad Accident.

Was on Her Way to This City Where She Had Accepted a Position.

Miss Edith Boyle of Leslie, while on her way Saturday night to this city, where she had accepted a position as trimmer at Mrs. Carr's millinery store, met with an accident at Thompsonville that resulted in the loss of her left leg.

She was changing cars at that point from the Ann Arbor to the Pere Marquette. The depots are but three rods apart, and as Miss Boyle passed from one to the other, a Pere Marquette train came into the depot. A snow bank on one side and the signal tower on the other, hid the approaching train from Miss Boyle. When she saw her danger it was too late to turn back, because of the snow bank, and she was struck by the engine, pilot and knocked across the rail.

Her left leg from the ankle to the knee was smashed and amputation was necessary. She was cared for by local physicians and relatives sent for. She will recover.

BAND ORGANIZED

Has Membership of Twenty Under Leadership of Douglas Nettleton.

Monday night was the first practice of the newly organized band, which will be known as the Charlevoix concert band. It is the intention to make this band equal to the old concert band, which was the best band our city ever had. The new band, of which Douglas Nettleton is conductor has a membership of twenty, mostly high players.

The boys intend to flash new uniforms the coming summer, and there will be something doing all the time in the way of lake excursions and concerts under their auspices.

They ask the support and good will of everybody, which is essential if we are to have a band in our city.

HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Will Meet Friday Evening With Mr. and Mrs.
Lisle Shanahan.

The Charlevoix Historical society will meet with Mr. and Mrs. Lisle Shanahan, Friday evening, March 14. The following is the program: Instrumental solo, Miss Doris Kane. Paper, "St. Patrick's Day—Christmas Ireland," Judge Mayne. Social intermission. Vocal solo, Miss Hollie Bon. Reading, "The Birth of St. Patrick."

WAS A REAL HORSE RACE

Primary Contest Between Hammond and McCartney for Commissioner.

Former Wins by a Small Majority—A Very Light Vote Was Cast.

The contest for the nomination for the two years term for county road commissioner between O. D. Hammond and Hugh McCartney, both of this city, developed into a real horse race, first one being ahead and then the other, until it took the official canvass to definitely determine the result. Mr. Hammond, winning by a majority of 15.

There was no opposition to Mr. Lorch and Mr. Hipp so the new board, after the formality of the April election, will consist of Lorch, Hipp and Hammond.

Mr. Lorch is a resident of Boyne City and has for several years represented his ward on the board of supervisors.

Mr. Hipp is a well known old resident of East Jordan and at the present time is president of the Agricultural society.

Mr. Hammond is a former street commissioner of this city and is well known throughout the county.

The vote for McCartney and Hammond by precinct follows: a remarkably small vote being cast.

NORTH MICH. PYTHIAN LEAGUE

Next Year's Meeting Will be Held in Manistee in March.

One of the Most Successful Meetings Ever Held in the State—Grand Officers Were Present.

The meeting of the Northern Michigan Pythian League held in this city Tuesday was one of the biggest events of the kind ever held in Michigan, about 200 Knights being present. A special train from Traverse City arrived about five o'clock p. m. bringing 100 enthusiastic Knights and every regular train was well filled.

A special convention of the Grand Lodge was held and the grand lodge rank was conferred on 17 past chancellors. The chief feature of the meeting was the contest for the silver cup, between five contestants. Manistee again proving the winner, Charlevoix losing by ritualistic errors. Among the distinguished participants in the contest was Past Chancellor Palmer of Manistee, prize winner sixth senator. The judges were the following grand officers. Grand Chancellor Charles W. Nichols, Lansing; Grand Vice-Chancellor, H. E. Vanleewalker, Ypsilanti; Grand Prelate James A. Muir, Port Huron; Grand Inner Guard Ray E. Hart, Battle Creek; Grand Outer Guard R. J. West, Deckerville. The score follows:

In place of the second line "Mr. Taggart criticizes the estate of," should read "Science and Christianity," the Rev. In the paragraph reading "We understand that God is not infinite," should read "NOT FINITE." In the fifth line from the bottom, "Is it not more reasonable to believe that these evil thoughts," it should read "these were evil thoughts."

CHAPTER V.

The Strange Behavior of a Chimney.

THERE was no reason in the world why Hartley Wiggins should not call upon two ladies living in Westchester county, and I must say that he appeared to advantage in Miss Hollister's library.

He had got into his evening clothes somewhere, perhaps at a neighboring inn or maybe at the house of a friend, for he could not possibly have motored into town and back since his interview with Cecilia in the highway. He had happened the clerk at the Hare and Tortoise with the idea that he had left New York for a long absence, and he had apparently camped at the gates of Hopetield to be near Cecilia.

When he had paid his compliments to the ladies he turned to me with an almost imperceptible lifting of the brows, but he was cordial enough. If he was surprised or disappointed at seeing me his manner did not betray the feeling.

"Glad to see you, Ames. Rather nice weather this."

"Even Dakota couldn't do better," I affirmed with a grin, but he ignored the ding.

Cecilia stirred restlessly, and I felt decidedly ill at ease. Miss Hollister crossed to the fireplace and poked the logs.

At what part Ezekiah Hollister played in the situation was beyond me. If I had not witnessed Wiggins' clandestine meeting with Cecilia matters would have been clearer to my comprehension, but his appearance at the house after the colloquy I had overheard from the brier patch was in itself inexplicable. Miss Hollister's singular references to Ezekiah—a person about whom my curiosity was now a good deal aroused—added to the mystery that infolded the library.

Responsive to Miss Hollister's energetic prodding, the flames in the fireplace leaped into the great throat of the chimney with a roar. She turned her back to the blaze, and looked upon her guests beatifically.

"If all your fires draw like that one they are not so much in need of doctoring," I remarked.

"Flues are nothing if not erratic," replied Miss Hollister. The subject did not appear to interest her, nor did she, by the remotest suggestion, refer to the object of my coming. I had sniffed vainly in the halls above and below for any trace of the stale smoke which usually greeted me at once on my arrival at the house of a client. "The house was built, you may not know, for a manufacturer of umbrellas, who died before he had occupied it. In circumstances I may later disclose to you, which accounts, Mr. Ames, for that figure of Cupid under a pink parasol on the drawing room ceiling. At the first opportunity I shall remove it as a baby's rattle."

I Seized the Tongue and Poker and Began Adjusting the Logs.

reconcilable with the militant love-making I admire. I consider umbrellas detestable and never carry one when I can command a mackintosh.

"When I'm on the march I wear a mackintosh," said Wiggins. "It's bullet proof, and that I have found at times a decided advantage."

We discussed mackintoshes for at least ten minutes with far more spirit than I had imagined the subject could evoke. Then Miss Hollister, after a turn up and down the room, turned beside me

"Mr. Ames," she said, "would you care to join me in a game of billiards? I'm not in my best form, but I think we might profitably knock the balls for half an hour."

I acquiesced with alacrity. I attributed it to be Miss Hollister's purpose to leave Cecilia and Wiggins alone. I should be rendering Wiggins and Cecilia a service by withdrawing, and I was glad of a chance to escape.

"To my infinite surprise they both protested, not in more polite manners, but with considerable vehemence.

"It's quite cool tonight, and I don't believe you ought to use the billiard room until the plumber has fixed the radiator," said Cecilia.

"And if you knew Mr. Ames' game I'm sure you wouldn't care to waste time on him," piped Wiggins, whom I had frequently vanquished in billiard bouts at the Hare and Tortoise, where I may say modestly, I had long been considered one of the most formidable of the club players.

Both he and Cecilia had risen, and we stood, I remember, just before the hearth during this exchange. At the moment a singular thing happened. The fire that had been sweeping in broad wavellike curve into the chimney was checked suddenly. I had repeatedly remarked the admirable draft, the facile grace of the flame as it rose and vanished. The cessation of the draft was unmarked by any of those preliminary symptoms by which a fire usually gives warning of evil intentions. The upward current of air had ceased utterly and without apparent cause. We were all aware of a choking, a gasping in the deep chest, which could not be accounted for by any natural stoppage incident to chimneys—the dislodging of masonry or a packing of the joints. The former was hardly possible and the house was not old enough to make the latter theory plausible. From my survey of the fire on my arrival in the afternoon I judged that this particular chimney had been little used.

The smoke now rolled out in billows and drove us back from the hearth. I seized the tongue and poker and began adjusting the logs, without, however, any hope of correcting a difficulty that lay patently in the upper regions of the fire itself. The smoke, after a courageous effort to rise, encountered an obstruction of some sort and ebbed back upon the hearth and out into the room. My efforts to stop the trouble by shifting the logs were futile, as I expected them to be, and I retreated quickly, making, I fear, no very gallant appearance as I mopped my face and eyes.

"Well," exclaimed Miss Hollister, who had rung for a servant to open the doors and windows, "this is certainly most extraordinary. What solution do you offer, Mr. Ames?"

"The matter requires investigation. I can't venture an opinion until I have made a thorough investigation. The night is perfectly quiet, and the wind is hardly responsible. I think we had better abandon the room until I can solve this riddle in the morning."

The prompt opening of the windows and doors caused the slow dispersion of the smoke, but the lights in the room still shone dimly as through a fog.

"It's beastly," ejaculated Wiggins, coughing. "I didn't suppose Pepper-ton would put a fire like that into a house. He ought to be shot!"

"It is fortunate," said Miss Hollister, "that Mr. Ames is on the ground. He now has a case that will test his most acute powers of diagnosis."

The logs that had burned so brightly before the chimney choked still held their flames submissively, and I had advised against pouring water upon them, fearing to crack the brick and stone work. We were about to adjourn to the drawing room. Miss Hollister and the others had in fact reached the door, leaving me alone before the hearth. Then, as I stood half blind watching the smoke pour out into the room and more puzzled than I had ever been before in any of my employments, the chimney, with a deep intake of breath, began drawing the smoke upward again. The flames caught and spread with renewed ardor, and when the fire still lingered in the hall returned in answer to my exclamation of surprise, the fire had recovered its composure and was behaving in a sane and normal manner.

"A swallow gently fell into the chimney and then set itself on fire," suggested Cecilia.

"The logs must have been wet. The sap hadn't dried out yet," proposed Wiggins.

"The wood was as dry as tinder," averred Miss Hollister, not without irritation. "And one swallow does not make a summer or a chimney smoke. It must have been a changing current of air. I was reading a book on bad lighting the other day, and it is remarkable how the air currents change."

"That is quite possible, as the air cools rapidly after sunset at this season, and that is bound to have an effect on the quality and resistance of the atmosphere," I replied sagely.

"Perhaps," suggested Miss Hollister, with one of those dashes of animation that were so delightful in her, "it was a ghost. The presence of a ghost in this house would give me the greatest pleasure. I should look upon a ghost's appearance at Hopetield Manor as a great compliment. If any reputable, decent ghost should by any chance take up his residence in this house I should give him every encouragement."

Miss Hollister seemed to have forgotten the proposed game of billiards. The chimney's lawless demonstration had, in fact, given a new turn to the evening. We discussed ghosts for half an hour, and then, without having enjoyed any opportunity for a single private word with Cecilia, Wiggins rose to leave. He shook hands all around and bowed from the door. It was in my mind to follow, making a pretense of walking with him to the station, but he had given me his car, but not his good night to me encounter.

such attentions, and as I pondered the outer door closed upon my irresolution.

At the stroke of 10 Miss Hollister rose and excused herself. "We break fast at 8, Mr. Ames. I trust the hour does not conflict with your habits."

I assured her that the hour was wholly agreeable, and she gave me her hand with great dignity.

When I turned toward Cecilia she had moved to a seat close by the hearth and was gazing dreamily into the fire, now a bed of glowing coals.

"It was odd," I remarked.

"You mean the chimney?"

"Yes. It was quite unaccountable I confess that I never knew a chimney's mood to change so abruptly."

She sat silent for several minutes, and then she lifted her head and her eyes met mine.

"Pardon me, Mr. Ames, but did I not ask you here to examine the chimney? I didn't quite understand. We have been here only a week; the weather has been warm, and I believe this fire had not been lighted before today. You will pardon my frankness, but I can't quite understand why you must insist on my here if you came personally. I thought when you appeared this afternoon that you were a guest—nothing more—or less."

"You had heard nothing of any trouble with the fireplace? Then I am in the dark as much as you." As I understood it, I was called here to examine the flues; but, now that I think of it, she did not say explicitly that her chimneys were behaving badly, though that was, of course, implied. I naturally assumed that she summoned me here in my professional capacity. I was a stranger to your aunt; she would hardly have invited me otherwise. I imagine, however, that your aunt acts a good deal on impulse. Her asking me here may have been only a whim."

"Please don't imagine that your coming has not been agreeable to me," Cecilia protested. "My aunt is quite capable of inviting a stranger to the house. She met you, I believe, at the Asolando. I hope you understand that it is only because I am in deep trouble, Mr. Ames, trouble of the gravest nature, that I have ventured to speak to you in this way of my aunt, for whom I have all respect and affection."

She had never, I was sure, been lovelier than at this moment. Her eyes filled, but she lifted her head proudly. Whatever the trouble might be I was sorry for it on her own account, and if it involved Hartley Wiggins my sympathy went out to him also. On an impulse I spoke of him.

"I was surprised to meet Hartley Wiggins here—He's a dear friend of mine, you know. I thought he had gone to his ranch. He left the Hare and Tortoise very abruptly a few nights ago just after we had dined together. He must be stopping somewhere in the neighborhood."

"It's quite possible. And there's my lun, you know. I fancy he drove over from there."

"I hadn't thought of that—the Prescott Arms I suppose you mean."

She nodded, but she was clearly not interested in me, and when I found myself falling dismally to sleep her thoughts to cheerfulness channels I rose and bade her good night.

The servant who had previously attended me appeared promptly when I reached my room, leaving a tray with biscuits and a bottle of ale. He gave me an envelope addressed in a hand I already knew as Miss Cecilia's, and I opened and read:

The following I either detect or distrust so kindly refrain from mentioning them while you are a guest of Hopetield Manor:

Automobiles
Mashed potatoes
Whiskers
Chopin's Concerto in E minor (op. 10, No. 3)
Bishop's Conductor
Tannhauser
Cats

Before I slept I threw up my window and stepped out upon a narrow balcony that afforded a capital view of the fields and woods to the east. The night was fine, with the sky bright with stars and moon. As my eyes dropped from the horizon to the near landscape I saw a man perched on a knoll in the midst of a cornfield. He stood as rigid as a sentry on duty, or like a forlorn commander counting the spears of his battered battalions. I was not sure that he saw me, for the lantern was slightly lowered, but, at any rate, he was staringly outlined to my vision. He doted, but had overcast gave him an odd appearance as he stood broadside above the corn. Then he vanished suddenly, though as he retired toward the highway I followed him for some time by the shaking and jerking of the corn stalks. I determined to make every effort to see Wiggins the next day and learn the exact status of his affair with Cecilia Hollister.

CHAPTER VI.

I Deliver a Message.

I WAS aroused at 6 o'clock the next morning by the sound of gun shots, and, springing out of bed, I beheld in an open pasture beyond the stable yard the indomitable Miss Hollister engaged in the pleasing pastime of breaking clay pigeons with a fowling piece. Her Swedish maid stood by with a formidable pad of paper, keeping score. A boy pulled the trap for her, and she threw up her gun and blazed away with a practiced hand. Her small shield, some time awaiting the launching of the force, the quick opening of the gun as she sighted, and the pause following the firing of the shot, in which she bent forward rigidly watching the result, would not have missed.

I will write it down here and do with it, that it had been my good fortune to know many delightful women, but I have never known one more interesting or charming than Miss Cecilia Hollister. The spirit of countless youth was in her heart, and gentle gay payments diltated about her as the reports of her gun fell cheerily upon the crisp morning air, a rebuke and a challenge to all indolent souls.

I made myself presuttable as quickly as possible and went forth to report her. She nodded pleasantly as I greeted her immediately after she had scored a capital shot. A second gun was produced, and I saw that it was not with out satisfaction that she observed my lack of prowess. One out of five was the best I could do, whereas she smashed three with the greatest ease.

"If I had known you would be up so early I should have sent coffee to your room," she remarked as we walked toward the house. "Very likely your lack of luck with the birds is attributable entirely to the impoverished state of your stomach."

Breakfast was served on a delightful sun porch that I had not before seen. Cecilia appeared promptly, having, in fact, been gathering tall flowers for some time. I judged, from the considerable amount of dry-anthemiums, asters, dahlias and nasturtiums which we found her arranging for the table. She seemed in excellent spirits and greeted us most amiably.

The mail arrived and was placed by Miss Hollister's plate before we left the table. She opened first a bulky envelope containing cuttings from a clipping bureau, and she tossed about upon these as she read.

"This persistent story of a sinking galleon off the Bolivian coast sounds unreliable, but I fear it is the work of a malicious gossip."

HOW TO BUILD A SAND-CLAY ROAD

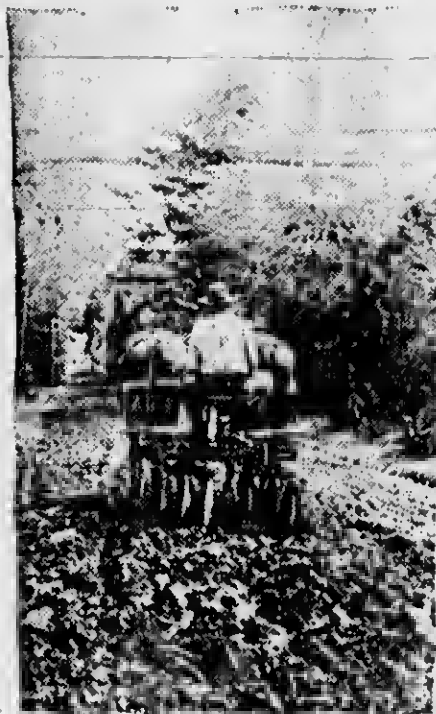

It is by Far the Most Economical Kind of Highway.

BALANCE THE MATERIAL.

Plenty of Sand is Necessary and a Good Water Resisting Clay For a Binder—Plow Deep For a Good Road, Says Expert.

The sand-clay road has been in use from time immemorial, and yet the study of it has been very recent. So far as I know, the study was never scientifically carried out prior to 1900, says W. L. Spoon, road engineer of Forsyth county, S. C. In Southern Good Roads. It was built in many places throughout South Carolina, and there are many discussions as to who the inventor was.

Now, the sand-clay road or the soil road, which is only a type, has shown a substantial durability as well as a cheapness in first cost and a cheapness in maintaining cost, or second cost; consequently it is the best road for country districts wherever conditions will permit. One of the best things about it is this—it is the most capable of withstanding automobile traffic, and the lateral or pull of the wheel seems to do but little or no harm. Then again it is the most delightful road for the stock of the farmer and the man who delights in traveling.

How would you build this sand-clay road? The first problem is to make a thorough investigation of natural conditions. Sand is the primary and the fundamental thing in the building of a sand-clay road. It is the art of a sand-clay road. The clay merely furnishes or forms a binder. The durability will depend largely upon the texture of the clay. If the clay is open and porous it will sponge up and lose its grip on the

HOOR OF MEET- ING CHANGED

After Next Sunday Will Meet at Five O'Clock Instead of Noon.

Last Sunday's Address by Professor. The Was Full of Interesting Thoughts.

Last Sunday Professor J. M. Tice, former Superintendent of Schools in Charlevoix, addressed the Men's class. His subject was the "Rise of Democracy and the Decline of Ecclesiasticism." Professor Tice's address was listened to with the greatest of interest and heartily applauded. The thought which he presented was quite new in many of its phases, but calculated to set men to thinking. It would be a great injustice to the address to attempt to give an account of it in a few words. Those who were present thoroughly enjoyed the address and those who were absent missed much stimulus to thought and reflection.

Next Sunday, March 16th, Mr. A. B. "Tony" Clark of Barnard, will address the class at the noon hour. He always has something to say which is interesting and profitable.

It was voted last Sunday to change the hour meeting for the class from 12:00 o'clock noon to 5:00 o'clock, p. m., the meeting to be held in the same place, the Carnegie Library building. This arrangement is to hold for one month as an experiment. The result of the change of the hour of meeting will be awaited with considerable interest.

The new arrangement goes into effect Sunday, March 24.

Saturday Special: Chocolate Fudge 10c per pound at Bert Beaulieu's. —Adv. 111

School of Instruction.

Tomorrow, Thursday, afternoon and evening, will be a big day for the Masonic fraternity. Grand Lecturer Gilbert of Bay City, will conduct a school of instruction for the lodges in this vicinity. Boyne City will confer the first, East Jordan the second and Charlevoix the third degree.

A feature of the meeting will be a fish supper. Will Smith having sent the lodge a box of fresh cod from Gloucester, Massachusetts, for the occasion.

easily kept in repair, more so than any class of macadam road, and at a cost that is very small in comparison.

The soil is turned over by plowing process in the cultivation, brought to the surface; the rain removes the easily absorbed parts of clay and leaves only that part which most firmly resists the action of rain. Therefore when you put it in the road you get a cohesive mass that holds together like cement almost. Now, really the trouble with the soil road is if the material is not right you put it down in this. You plow up six inches of soil and you say at once you have a foot of soil. It expands or opens up to almost double its volume. If you want a soil road of ten inches you must put down fourteen inches of loose material, so that when it is firmly walked together you have a twelve inch road. If you build that strong enough you will save steel tire times out of ten.

The Rev. A. Benall, secretary of the Northport Fruit Growers' association is urging the members of the association to set out cherry trees in preference to fruit trees of other kinds. He says that the cherry does wonderfully well in the Northport section and that the area over which cherries can be produced satisfactorily is small. He, therefore, believes that the Northport region should specialize upon this fruit.

A man stepped up to the ticket seller of a moving picture show, in Flint and told the man at the door that his wife was in there with another man, and he intended to wait until they came out. After the reel, which was then being shown, the manager interrupted the show long enough to make this announcement: "There's a tough guy outside waiting for his wife and the man who brought her here. I'd advise the pair to step out the back way." There was a hasty bustle and a man who claimed to count says there were 15 couples shot out through the back door.

DEATH OF BESSIE STRAW

Called From This Earth While on the Threshold of Life.

Graduated From Charlevoix County Normal With
Class of 1907.

Bessie Straw, youngest daughter of William and Rose Straw, was born October 23, 1888, on the farm in Marion where her mother still lives. Her life in childhood was the happy care-free life that falls to the lot of children surrounded by fond parents and loving brothers and sisters.

In due time she attended the district school and later spent three years in the Charlevoix high school. She then spent a year at the County Normal, graduating from that institution in 1907 as president of her class.

Full of life, hope and ambition in no common degree, she started out on her new career as teacher in the district schools. Possessing as she did, a rare brilliancy of mind and ability in many ways far in excess of most young women of her age, her friends predicted for her a full and useful life. But alas! physical weakness compelled her retirement from active life about two years ago and on the sixth day of March, 1913, God in His wisdom transported this frail blossom to a higher plane, there to meet her father, William Straw, who had preceded this loved one to the Heavenly home by less than three months.

Bessie Straw has left to mourn her loss, her bereaved mother, two brothers, William K. and Sam Straw of Marion, and two sisters, Mrs. Rose Lauphere of Marion and Mrs. Nellie Tillotson of Hayes.

The funeral service was held at the residence Monday afternoon, March 10th, Rev. Quinton Walker officiating. Interment in Brookside cemetery.

BEAUTIFYING THE HOME.

When Planting Trees Try to Obtain Effect of Space and Freedom.

A mistake commonly made in planting trees and shrubs on the home grounds is that of placing something in every available bit of space. The yard is planted as though it were an orchard or a grove, the trees being placed at regular intervals or scattered about haphazardly wherever a sufficient clear space is found. Abundance of shade is undoubtedly obtained in this way, but such planting does not utilize all the possibilities for beauty and variety of effect which even a small yard affords.

A more satisfactory method is that which takes into account the beauty and value of the open spaces of lawns and makes the most of them by massing the trees and shrubs according to a fairly definite plan along the sides and at the rear of the stretches of grassward. In this way there is no sacrifice of shade, and an effect of

BEAUTIFULLY SURROUNDED FARM HOME. Spaciousness and freedom is obtained which is ordinarily quite lacking where trees and shrubbery are crowded closely together all about the place.

Such planting, in fact, when skillfully done, makes a small yard seem larger or, in any case, nothing smaller than it actually is. Even a small sweep of lawn if it is unbroken gives something of an effect of breadth and size, and the trees and shrubs thickly and somewhat irregularly planted about its edges are effective in concealing the true shape and limits of the grounds. Flower beds, except where a consistently formal effect is attempted, should be kept out of the middle of the lawn. They may be used to advantage as borders along the walks, buildings and hedges or masses of shrubs. Shrubs are most naturally planted in groups, by themselves or in connection with a row or mass of trees to form a screen or background.

Trees may sometimes be planted very close together with good effect. The charm, particularly to children, of a densely shaded retreat or a thicket of trees and bushes in some corner is not always realized by the town dweller. Too many trees and shrubs should not be planted close to the house, as they interfere with the light and tend to induce dampness.—National Stockman and Farmer

WHO'S A REAL FARMER?

The real farmer is thus described by T. A. Givens of Nebraska: "In my estimation, the man who simply raises corn and wheat and hay to haul to market is not a farmer. But rather the man who raises a sufficient diversity of crops best suited to his locality to furnish a rotation and maintain the productivity of the soil and who does not sell these as a raw material, but feeds them on the farm to different kinds of good stock that he has raised himself, is entitled to the honor of being called a farmer—yes, a good farmer."—Kansas Farmer

Disadvantages of Various Soils.

Clay soils are unfavorable to vegetation because the soil is too close and adhesive to allow the free passage of air or water to the roots of the plants. It also obstructs the expansion of the fibers of the root. Sandy soils are unfavorable because they consist of particles that have too little adhesion to each other. They do not retain sufficient moisture for the nourishment of the plants. They allow too much solar heat to pass to the roots. Chalk soils are unfavorable because they do not absorb the solar heat and are therefore cold to the roots of the plants.—Iowa Homestead

GOOD ROADS WOULD SAVE $250,000,000 FOR FARMERS

That Much Wasted in Crop Haulage
In Record Year.

J. L. Pennybaker, Jr., executive secretary of the American road congress makes the assertion that $250,000,000 would be saved in the cost of hauling this year's record breaking crops if 20 per cent of our public highways were improved, thus reducing the cost of horse haulage and permitting an extensive use of motor trucks.

At the present time only about 5 per cent of American highways can be classed as improved. The main object of the American road congress is to influence public opinion that the number of miles of improved highways will be rapidly increased in the next few years. Interesting figures and statistics have been compiled to prove the economic advantages of improved highways.

"The government's prediction that the crop now being harvested will exceed any previous year's yield," said Mr. Pennybaker, "should serve to attract attention to the great losses that are being sustained by farmers and consumers in the hauling of crops. It is estimated that the improvement of the main roads of this country, approximately 20 per cent, would result in an annual saving of at least $250,000,000 in the cost of hauling alone, which would be sufficient to improve 200,000 miles of road at a further cost of $7,000 per mile. In five years this would improve 250,000 miles, which would be sufficient to bring the total mileage of improved roads up to 20 per cent."

One Great Man's Tribute to Another. He smote the rock of the nation's resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the corpse of Public Credit and it sprang upon its feet.—Webster's Speech on Hamilton March 10, 1831.

WILL EMPLOY FARM EXPERT

Meeting at Court House Last Friday Was Enthusiastic One.

TEMPORARY ORGANIZATION

D. S. Payton Elected President—Committees on Education Appointed.

Charlevoix Business Men Pledge Support to the Association—Officers and Committees Hard at Work on Plans.

The horrible condition of the roads prevented a very large attendance at the meeting held in the Court House Friday for the purpose of organizing a crop improvement association under the plan of the United States Department of Agriculture. However, every portion of the county was represented and much interest was manifested.

The meeting was called to order in the forenoon by W. J. Rachow, who explained the action taken by the Michigan Bankers' association in fostering the movement and explained what it was hoped would be accomplished in the way of better farming by the employment of a crop expert. He also took up the financing of the movement and explained how the total estimated cost of $3,000 per annum, the United States would pay $1,200 and the crop improvement committees of the Boards of Trade, $500, leaving a balance of about $1,300 to be raised by the county.

The matter was further discussed by Messrs. Bisbee of East Jordan, Smith of Boyne City and Bridge of Charlevoix, representing their respective banks. All the banks promised liberal financial assistance toward the movement.

D. S. Payton, who has had considerable correspondence with the men back of the movement, explained the work which had been accomplished by the farm expert in Kent and other counties in improving agricultural methods.

County Commissioner of Schools Millard, explained how the work was an adjunct to the teaching of agriculture in our schools and how he had been in correspondence with all the schools in the county in regard to their giving financial assistance.

Owing however to a misrepresentation, an idea having in some way gotten out that it was proposed to employ two men instead of one, the responses had been disappointing. The matter was further discussed until a recess was taken for dinner.

After dinner, Elmer Ingalls, William Withers, John Mason, John Knudsen and other prominent farmers continued the discussion giving their heartiest sympathy to the movement.

It was decided to form a temporary organization and in the meantime conduct a campaign of education and ascertain the best method of financing an association of one is formed. The following temporary officers were chosen:

President—D. S. Payton, Charlevoix.

Vice-Presidents—Frank Bricker, Evangline; H. L. Olney, South Arm.

Secretary—Glenn M. DuBois, Charlevoix.

Treasurer—R. W. Padlock, Charlevoix.

The following committees were appointed on education in their sections of the county:

Boys' City—S. C. Smith, E. B. Dow, Frank Wannerman, Herman Meyer, Terry S. Barber.

East Jordan—R. O. Bisbee, with power to appoint his own associates.

Beaver Island—W. J. Gallagher, Hugh P. Boyle.

Charlevoix—E. S. Stacks, R. W. Padlock, E. E. Stroud, R. S. Shapton, Glenn M. DuBois.

Marion—Elmer Ingalls, Fred Nason, Edmund Shapton, Nat Burns, William Withers.

Ironton—John Knudsen, Dave Grant, Grant Hammond, E. B. Clark, Ole Lyngklip.

Further committee appointments will be announced later.

The meeting then adjourned subject to the call of the president and secretary.

We believe that the movement launched at this meeting means more for Charlevoix county than any other movement ever inaugurated for the development of the whole county and when once fully understood the matter of raising the small percent of expense asked from the county will be an easy task. From now on every member of the various committees, as well as the officers, will be pleased to give any information required, in fact, they invite inquiries from everybody.

Let us all work together in this movement and show that Charlevoix is one of the progressive counties of Michigan.

Tuesday evening a citizens' meeting was held at the Court House which was quite well attended by our business men and the nearby farmers.

Financial assistance in the work of organization was pledged by prominent business men and membership cards, pledging $200 yearly, toward the maintenance of the association were freely signed.

Mr. Payton, the temporary president, as well as all the officers are hard at work and with his record as a Charlevoix county booster the success of the movement is assured.

MAMMOTH PRINTING PLANT

Is the Government Printing Office at Washington, D. C.

Six Miles of Postage Stamps Printed Daily—Other Interesting Statistics.

It is a fact not generally known that the United States has at Washington, D. C. one of the largest and best equipped printing plants in this or any other country. Uncle Sam may be safely said to hold the world's record as a printer, not only in size of plant, number of employees and extent of output, but also in up-to-date scientific management, efficiency and economy.

An interesting example of what this sort of modern efficiency means is a machine which prints, gums, perforates 12,000 postage stamps a minute. Figuring on an eight hour day, this is a production of 5,760,000 2-cent stamps, worth $115,200, as a day's work for the two operators required on the machine. The stamps are shot out, there is no other way to express it, at the rate of 70 feet a minute. This means over six miles of postage stamps a day.

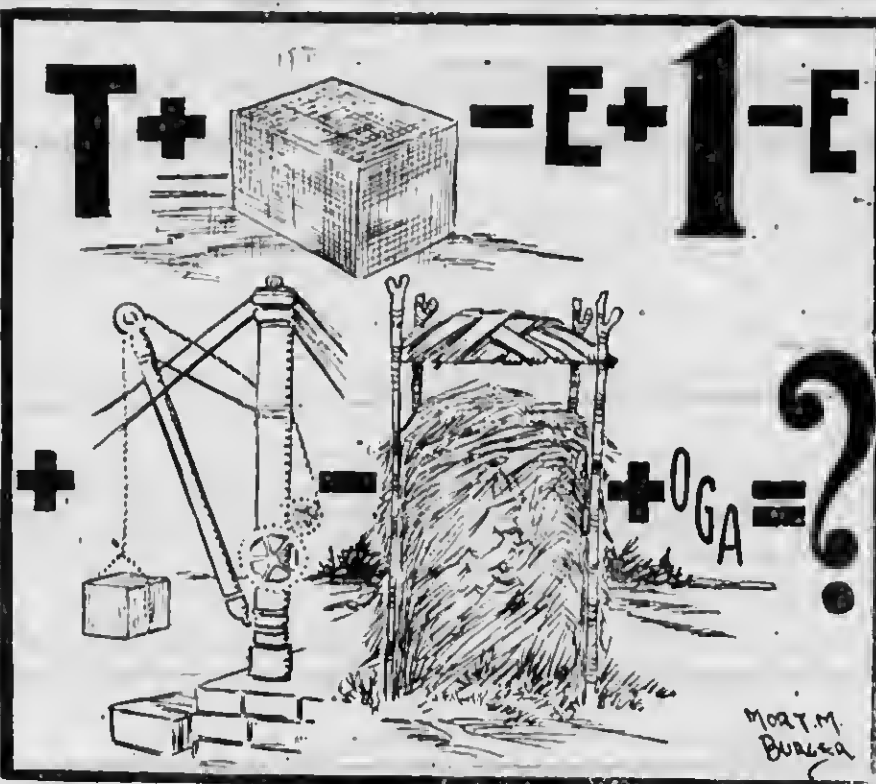

The machine eliminates 19 separate operators required by the previous method of printing and has effected a saving of 31 per cent in cost. The whole apparatus, which is three feet wide, 25 long and seven high, is driven by a Crocker-Wilson motor. One man and a girl are able to operate the entire machine and the perfecting device connected with it. B. R. Stickney, mechanical expert of the United States bureau of printing and engraving, is the inventor who developed the machine for the special use of the government printing plant.

Auction Sales.

The season for auction sales is at hand and the Courier columns are being freely used. This week we advertise two auction sales. On page seven we advertise the sale of John R. BAXTER W. R. C. ENTERTAINS

Over a Score of the Members of Lombard W. R. C. Petoskey the Guests.

Meeting Will Long be Remembered Both by Guests and Hosts.

Thursday afternoon Baxter W. R. C. was the host of Lombard Corps of Petoskey, over a score of the Petoskey ladies being present.

From the Petoskey News we clip the following from one of the visitors.

Those who were so fortunate as to attend were given one of the most enjoyable afternoons it has been our good fortune to have ever experienced. A delegation from Baxter Corps met us as Charlevoix station. As there was a large delegation of Petoskey Nasons also bound for Charlevoix, we found the buses unable to care for us. Then shown forth the courtesy of our fraternal brother. A bus was quickly emptied and placed at our command. When we saw the condition of the streets we wondered how these gentlemen ever reached Charlevoix.

The drive over was greatly enjoyed by some of the more timid ladies who also had the more exquisite pleasure of anticipating the return trip at night. The ladies of Baxter Corps are general and their cordial greetings won our hearts. That they are workers was proven by the initiation of a class of six candidates into the order.

At the close of the business session we were ushered into the dining hall, where we were feasted until all memory of that "ride" had left us. The toasts were in many cases exceptionally merry. The visitors were then decorated with carnations, and we all said good night.

The ride to the station called forth a wall of woe, but the information that the train was on time was balm to our spirits. The Petoskey delegation arrived in "The Only One" happy and feeling that our motto of "Friendship, Charity and Loyalty" had been strengthened by our pleasant meeting with Baxter Corps.

ENJOYED FISH SUPPER

Masonic Brethren Had Fine Time at School of Instruction Thursday.

Thursday was Masonic day in Charlevoix, members of the different lodges in the vicinity attending a school of instruction conducted by Frank O. Gilbert of Bay City, grand lecturer of the grand lodge. All that were present report a fine time, the big feature being the fish supper, the lodge having received a box of fresh cod from Will Smith of Gloucester, Massachusetts.

The first degree work was conducted by the Petoskey team as the Boyne City delegation which was scheduled for that part of the program failed to put in an appearance. All the visitors were enthusiastic over the new home of the Charlevoix Nasons.

NEW PARCEL POST RULING

Puts Package of Over Four Ounces in the Fourth Class.

A new ruling has been issued by the postoffice department which brings all parcels weighing over four ounces under the parcel post system. The ruling reads as follows: "Parcels weighing more than four ounces must be mailed at a postoffice or delivered to a rural or other carrier daily authorized. Parcels weighing under four ounces may be mailed in the same manner as matter of other classes in street package boxes."

Heretofore it has been possible to mail any package under other classes by paying the extra postage which is called for, but the new ruling puts all heavy packages in the fourth class.

A contract for 6,000 wicker hampers has been awarded for use in the parcel post work. They will be tried out in the larger offices and if satisfactory will be introduced in all the offices. So far the regular mailing bags have been used for this department of the service and the change has been made because of the crushing of fragile material which sometimes takes place when the matter is handled in this manner.

The C. O. D. ruling which was recently issued for the parcel post service will go into effect July 1. On payment of ten cents in extra parcel post stamps the package will be sent C. O. D. up to an amount of one hundred dollars.

PURPOSES ADOPTING NEW PLAN

State Highway Department Would Divide The State Into Districts.

Would Have Many Advantages Over The Present Plan of State Supervision.

During the last five months of the road building season of 1912, 457 miles of road were completed and accepted by the state highway department, as entitled to state reward. This is 53 miles more road than was built in the first four years after state and became available in Michigan, and it is estimated that before the close of the present fiscal year, on June 30, there will have been completed 500 miles of road in the previous 12 months, making at that time the grand total of state reward roads in Michigan of not less than 1,327 miles.

In view of this rapid increase in road construction it is thought that not less than $1,000,000 will be required to pay the state rewards during the next two fiscal years which end June 30 1915. Anticipating this, Senator King has introduced a bill to the state legislature asking that the above amount be appropriated for use of the state highway department during that period.

With this rapid increase in road building the demands on the state highway department are much greater than its present force can supply. To meet this demand with a reasonable force, Deputy Commissioner Frank E. Rogers is working on plans for districting the state with a view to placing a first class road engineer in charge of the road building operations of each district, but who would be subject to orders and instructions from the state highway department at Lansing.

The district plan would have many advantages over a large force of engineers traveling from the main office. First, it would materially reduce the traveling expenses and hotel bills of each engineer. Second, it would greatly economize time for the distance required to travel to reach a given road would be comparatively short, and several roads could be visited each day. Third, the engineer would be able to visit each road many times during construction, and advise with and assist the road builder a great deal more than it has been possible to do in the past. Under this plan the engineer would soon have intimate knowledge of the road in his district and the available road materials as well. He would be in intimate touch with the road builders of his district, and would be able to render personal assistance right on the road where it is most needed, and at a time when it would be most valuable, especially to the inexperienced commissioner or superintendent.

Mr. Rogers is very much interested in this plan, and it allowed to put it in force, believes that it will do a great deal towards raising the standard of road building in Michigan and thus make the state reward road even more popular than it is now.

DEATH OF MRS. L. W. FITCH

Mother of Postmaster Fitch and Prosecuting Attorney Fitch.

Had Been a Resident of This City About Four Years—Leaves Four Children.

Mrs. L. W. Fitch, who has been a sufferer for a number of years, died at her home in this city on Tuesday morning.

Elizabeth Love was born in Livingston county, November 26, 1812, February 14, 1866, she was married to Louis W. Fitch of the same county. They spent their life there until 1908 when they moved to this city. Mr. Fitch, erecting a handsome home on Michigan avenue. Mr. Fitch died in April of last year.

Mrs. Fitch was the mother of four children, Dwight H. of East Jordan, the present prosecuting attorney of this county, Postmaster Arthur L. of this city, Homer L., a practicing attorney of Escanaba and Mrs. C. H. Tooley of Boyne City.

The funeral will be held from the house Thursday forenoon, Rev. Quinton Walker officiating.

During her residence in this city Mrs. Fitch has been an invalid, which prevented her gaining a wide acquaintance, but all who enjoyed her friendship give witness that in the highest degree she had filled her part in life as a loving wife and mother and faithful friend.

FLOOD NEAR PETOSKEY

Thaw Last Week Caused Considerable Damage at Farm of Jap Anderson.

The thaw of last week caused a flood on the farm of Jap Anderson, one mile southwest of Petoskey. Wednesday of last week and did considerable damage.

With a rush about noon the flood came and the water was about four feet deep in places before anything could be done. The poultry house was all but covered and a number of chickens were drowned. Water eighteen inches deep covered the floor of the barn and the horses and cattle were rescued with difficulty. No damage was done to the residence but some crops that were stored in outhouses were damaged.

BIRDS ARE NOW PROTECTED

Weeks-McLean Bill Will Bar Spring Duck Shooting in Michigan.

END OF NINE YEARS FIGHT

For Federal Regulation of the Killing of Migratory Birds.

Estimated That It Will Mean a Saving of Eight Hundred Million Dollars to Agricultural Interests of the Country.

This will be the last year of spring duck shooting in Michigan.

That ruling, as applied to water fowl, has been made by both national houses of congress in the passage of the Weeks-McLean bill, placing all migratory birds under federal protection. It is the end of a nine years' fight, in which the American Game Protection association secured endorsement by practically every man prominent as a naturalist or game protector in the country, as well as by thousands of citizens from all over the United States. The matter has been brought before the national and state Granges and the state and local game protective associations with the result that there has been a powerful co-operative movement for federal protection on foot far more than a year. Its successful culmination is considered the most important event in the history of game conservation in the United States.

The Weeks-McLean bill delegates to the Department of Agriculture power to regulate the killing of all migratory birds. This will bring timely protection to many species of wild fowl and shore birds that would otherwise soon join the species already extinct, and will also make it possible to cut down the annual loss of $800,000,000, which is suffered by agricultural interests on account of insect pests, by giving insect eating birds a chance to increase.

The first bill for federal protection of migratory birds was introduced in 1901 by Hon. George Shiras, then a member of congress from Pennsylvania. The bill was referred to the house committee on agriculture but was not reported. In December, 1908, Hon. John W. Weeks of Massachusetts introduced a measure modeled after the Shiras bill, which was referred to the same committee and met the same fate. In May, 1909, Mr. Weeks introduced his bill with modifications and, while much interest in the matter was aroused, there was never enough co-operation among those interested to secure a hearing.

At the first session of the sixty-second congress three bills on the subject of protection to migratory birds were presented; the Weeks bill on April 4, the Anthony bill on April 12, and the McLean bill on May 17, 1911. All the bills mentioned received the endorsement of sportsmen and naturalists, but it was not until the American Game Protective and Propagation association secured hearings on March 6 for the last three, that the favorable sentiment of the whole country was brought to bear. The Weeks-McLean bill as passed is a combination of all of them, but is modeled chiefly on an amendment of the Weeks bill.

Among those given credit for helping the movement is W. B. Merston of Saginaw, president of the Michigan association for the protection of fish and game. The bill means the abolition of spring shooters of water fowl in all states where it is now allowed, including Michigan, after the adoption of the proper regulations.

FARMERS BEWARE

In buying your Clover Seed this spring as there are large quantities of shrunken Clover Seed on the market which are being offered at tempting prices. This grade is usually classed as prime or choice seed in the market reports.

There are Several Things to Remember in Buying Seed. Some of the Most Important Are:

- FIRST—Important as price may be, yet Quality is much more essential. The sweetness of Low Price never equals the Bitterness of Poor Quality.
- SECOND—Good clean seed of High Germination will cover more ground than will seed of Poor Quality.
- THIRD—A few cents saved in the Cost of Seed may lose you many Dollars in the crop.
- FOURTH—Every weed on your farm occupies the place where a Useful Plant might grow.

We call Special Attention to Our C. H. C. Brands of Clover and Grass Seeds.

This greatly superior grade of seeds, by special machinery, is made absolutely free from chaff, and almost every weed seed is taken out. The very slightly increased cost over the ordinary Grass and Clover Seed is trifling while Every Pound is actually worth Two or Three Times as much as the grades usually sold.

Medium Red, or June	Orchard Grass	Alsike, or Swedish
This is by far the most important of all the varieties for practical purposes. Sown in spring or fall and if no other grasses are sown, at the rate of eight to twelve pounds per acre; more is required on old, stiff soils than on new and lighter ones.	Desirable on account of its quick growth and valuable aftermath. It is ready for grazing in spring two weeks earlier than most grasses and when fed it is again ready for grazing in a week and will continue green when other grasses are withered by dry weather. It is palatable and nutritious and stock eat it greedily when green. A tendency to grow in tufts must be feared, and as it ripens at the same time, the mixed hay is of the best quality. If sown alone, about twenty-eight pounds are required per acre; if sown with clover, half that quantity. Perennial and will last for years.	The most hardy of all clovers; perennial. On rich, moist soil it yields an enormous quantity of hay or pasture, but its greatest value is for sowing with other clovers and grasses, as it forms a thick bottom and greatly increases the yield of hay; and it is preferred to any other forage. The heads are globular, fragrant and much liked by bees which deposit a large amount of honey from them. Sown in spring or fall, at the rate of six pounds per acre, when used alone.
Mammoth, or Large Red	Alfalfa, or Lucerne Clover	White Dutch
Grows nearly twice the size of the Common Red Clover, often making a stand when the other clover fails. Sown alone at twelve pounds per acre; if sown with clover, half that quantity. Perennial and will last for years.	Of all the different kinds of Clover, Alfalfa is the hardest and most productive. During long protracted droughts it will flourish and yield abundantly when all other vegetation dies. Our Seed is the best Mammoth Dry Land Seed that money can buy.	A small, creeping perennial variety valuable for pasture and for hay. It accommodates itself to a variety of soils, but prefers moist ground. Sown in spring at the rate of six pounds per acre, or when used with other grasses, half that amount.
Timothy
The most valuable of all the grasses for hay, especially in the north. Thrives best on moist, fertile soils of medium tendency. It should be cut just when the blossoms fall. Sown early in the spring or fall, at the rate of twelve pounds per acre; if alone, but less if mixed with other grasses.

Regardless of scarcity or price, we will always hold our C. H. C. Brand of Seeds at the highest lead of Quality. No seed will go out under that name unless it is absolutely High Grade.

If any of our out of town customers buy this seed and it is not up to our description in quality, we ask them to return the seed and we will refund their money and pay the freight charges both ways.

We will have Seed Oats for sale which we will guarantee to be free from any mustard seed and will weigh 42 pounds to the measured bushel.

If you have any samples of seed which you wish to examine closely, you will be welcome to the use of our magnifying glass; it will show just what grade of seed you are buying. Examine the seed before you buy.

The Siege of the Seven Suitors

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Copyright, 1910, by Meredith Nicholson

CHAPTER VII. I Meet Hezekiah.

WIGGINS asked me to lunch on, and on the way back to the inn, after inquiring my plans for returning to town, he proposed that I delay my departure until the following day. What he wanted, and he put it bluntly, was a friend at court, and as I had seen him satisfied him of my entire good faith and of my devotion to his interests, he begged that I prolong my stay in Miss Hollister's house, giving me my excuse the condition of the chimneys of Hope-field Manor. He brushed aside the plea of other engagements and appealed to our old friendship. He was talking his troubles hard, and I felt that he really needed counsel and support in the involved state of his affairs. I did not see how my continued presence under Miss Hollister's roof could materially assist him, and the thought of remaining there when there was no work to be done was repugnant to my sense of professional honor, but he was so persistent that I finally yielded.

While we ate luncheon I sought by every means to divert his thoughts to other channels. After we were seated in the dining room four other men followed, expressing considerable interest in the subject as far from one another as possible. A few moments later a motor hummed into the driveway, and we heard its owner ordering his servant to return to town and hold himself subject to telephone call. The latest arrival appeared shortly in the dining room, and surveying the rest of us with a disdained air, sought a table in the remotest corner of the room.
Others appeared, until eight in all had entered. The presence of these men in this hour, their air of aloofness and the care they exercised in isolating themselves interested me. They appeared to be gentlemen. They were, indeed, suggestive of the upper and respectable world, and one of them was manifestly a foreigner.

While Wiggins appeared to introduce them, I was conscious that the respective arrivals with every manifestation of contempt, time of these distinguished gentlemen seemed familiar.
I could not at once recall him, but something in his manner teased my memory for a moment before I placed him. Then it dawned upon me that he was the third man I had met in the field overlooking the garden after my eyes-opening experience the day before. I thought it was well, however, not to mention this fact, or to speak of the man I had seen so lately posted in the midst of the cornfield. I was an observer, a looker-on, at Hopefield, and my immediate business was the conduct of information.

"Will you kindly tell me, Wiggins, why these strange gentlemen are and how what has brought them here at this hour?"

"I know them—they are guests of the inn. Most of them were more or less companions in our procession across Europe last summer. The one in the tan suit is Henderson—you must have heard of him. The short dark chap of attractive countenance is John Stewart Dick, who pretends to be a philosopher. As for the others—"

He dismissed them with a jerk of his head. My wits struggled with his explanation. It is my wish to reduce information to plain terms.

"Are these gentlemen, then, your rivals for the hand of Miss Cecilia Hollister? If so, they are a solemn band of suitors, I must confess."

"You have hit it, Ansel. They are suitors, assembled from all parts of the world."

"Nice looking fellows, except the chap with the monocle, who has just ordered rather more liquor than a gentleman should at this hour."

"That is Lord Arrowood. I have feared at times that Miss Octavia favored him."

"Possibly, but not likely. But how long is this thing going to last? If you fellows are going to hang on here until Miss Cecilia Hollister has chosen one of you for her husband I shander for your nerves. I imagine that any one of these gentlemen is likely to begin shooting across his plate at my minute. Such a situation would be come intolerable very quickly if I were in the game and forced to lodge here."

"I hope," replied Wiggins with heat,
"that you don't imagine these fellows can crowd me out. I've paid for a month's lodging in advance, and if you will stand by me I'm going to win."

"Spoken like a man, my dear Wiggins! You may count on me to the sweet or bitter end, even if I pull down all the superb chimneys with which Peppercorn adorned that house up yonder."

the valet at the Inn and Tortoise to send me a week's supply of linen and an odd suit or two.

At about 2 o'clock I left Wiggins in that nice spirits and set out on my return to Hopefield Manor.

I made a wrong turn on leaving the Prescott Arms, and I came out presently near National village. I got my bearings of a shopkeeper and started again for Hopefield Manor, but the mid-afternoon was warm, and the hills were steep, and as Miss Hollister's admirable coach showed signs of weariness
I drove into a fence corner and loosened the mare's check. On a sunny slope several hundred yards above the highway lay an orchard, advertised to the larcenous eye by the riddlest of two apples. Not in many years had I robbed an orchard, and I felt irresistibly drawn toward the guarded trees, which I were still, in their old age, abundantly fruitful.

I drew down a branch and plucked the first apple, tasted and found it good. At my public first responsive utilization something whizzed past my ear, and, following the flight of the missile, I saw an apple of goodly size fall and roll away into the grass. I had laughed myself utterly alone and even now as I looked guiltily around no one was in sight. The apple had passed my ear swiftly and at an angle quite un-Newtonian. It had been fairly aimed at my head, and the law of gravitation did not account for it. As I continued my scrutiny of the landscape I was addressed by a voice, whose accents were not objectionary.
Rather, the tone was good natured and indulgent if not indeed a true patronizing. The words were these:

"Soup of the evening, beautiful soup."

It was then that, lifting my eyes, I beheld, sitting lengthwise of the wall, with her feet drawn comfortably under her, a girl in a white sweater barreled, munching an apple. There was no question of identity. It was the girl whose head behind the castler's grill of the Asolando had interested me on the occasion of my second visit to the tea room. In soliciting my attention by reciting a line of verse she had merely followed the usage of the tea room in like circumstances. The casting of the apple at my head possessed the virtue of notifying me. While I tried to think of something to say I pecked at my own apple, but kept an eye on her. She responded to my gaze calmly and then away the core.

"I mentioned soup," she remembered. "The courses are mixed. We have partaken of fruit. Are you fish, flesh, fowl or good red herring?"

"Daughter of Eve, I will be my thing you like. I'm obliged for the apple, and I apologize for having encumbered Eden unhelmed."

"It's not my Eden. Nobody helms me. But it's not too much to say that these apples are grand."

"I'm glad we're both in the same boat. I'm a trespasser myself. I don't even know the name of the owner.
But if you have had only one apple two more are coming to you if you follow Atlanta's precedent."

"I don't follow precedents, and I've forgotten the name of the boy who threw the apples in the race. It doesn't matter, though. Nothing matters very much."

Her hands clasped her knees. Her skirt was short, and I was conscious that she wore fan shoes. She continued to regard me with lazy curiosity. She seemed younger than at the Asolando. Not more than eighteen times had apples reddened on the bough in her lifetime. She was even simpler and more youthful in her sweater than in the snowy vestment of the Asolando. Her hair, which in the glow of the lamp at Asolando had looked brown, was now a rich, warm copper and was brushed straight back from her forehead and fast with a black ribbon.

"I quite agree with your philosophy.
Nothing is of great importance."

"So it's not your orchard?" she asked.
"The thought distresses me. I own no lands nor ships at sea. I'm a child, my doctor, and if necessary I'll appeal to you."

"You needn't submit testimonials. I take the swallows out of my own chimneys."

"That requires a deft hand, and I'm sure you're considerable of the swallows."

"You may come up here and sit on the wall if you care to—I saw you driving in a trap. I hope your horse isn't afraid of motors. Motors speed scandalously on that road."

"I'm not in the least worried about my horse. It's borrowed. As you remarked, this is a nice orchard. I like it here."

"If you are going to be silly you will find me little inclined to nonsense."

"Shall we talk of the Asolando? I haven't been back since I saw you there, and yet—let me see, isn't this your day there?"

She seemed greatly amused, and her laughter rose with a fountain-like spontaneity and fell, a splash of musical sound, on the mellow air of the orchard. She had changed her position as I joined her, sitting erect and kicking her heels lazily against the wall.

"Mr. Chimney Man, something terrible happened just after you left that afternoon. I was hounded, fired—I lost my job."

"Incredible! I'm sure it was not for any good cause. I can testify that you were a model of attention—not wonderfully discreet. You repelled me in the most delicate manner when I intimated that I should come often on the days that you made the change."

"The sad part of it was that, that was not only my last day, but my first.
I had never been there before, except for a nibble now and then when I was in town. But I couldn't stand it. I was like being in jail in fact. I thought I would be preferable. But I'm glad I spent that one day there. They disposed with my company because I remarked to one of the silly girls who are making the Asolando their headquarters that I thought the English prefession had carried the dish farther too far. The girl to whom I interfered this heresy was so shocked she dropped a teacup—you know how brittle everything is in there—and I came home. You were really the only adventure I got out of my day there.

And I didn't find you entirely satisfactory."

"Thank you, Francesa, for these confidences. And having lost your position you are now free to roam the hills and dream on orchard walls.
Your scheme of life is to my liking. I can see with half an eye that you were born for the open and that the walls of no prison house can ever hold you again."

"She nodded a dreamy acquiescence and she turned two very brown eyes fall upon me and demanded:
"What is your name, please?"
I mentioned it.

"And you doctor chimneys? That sounds very amusing."

"I'm glad you like it. Most people think it absurd."

"What are you doing here? There's not a chimney in sight."

"Oh, I have a commission in the neighborhood, Hopefield Manor. You may have heard of Miss Hollister's place."

"Of course, every one knows of her."
"And now that I think of it, it was she about whom you asked in the Asolando that afternoon. You wanted to know what she said about the tea room."

"I remember perfectly."

"She was quiet for a moment, then she threw back her head and laughed that rare laugh of hers. "You might let me into the joke."

"It wouldn't mean anything to you I have a lot of private jokes that are for my own consumption."

"Your way of laughing is adorable.
I hope to hear more of it. In the Asolando you reminded me in a manner that even my admiration, but I wanted to say now that, if you roam these pastures, I may the grass beneath your feet, and if you're thoughtful water be soured to you I sit beside the brook to learn its song."

"You talk well, sir, but from you
I fear you can't forget that we met first in the Asolando. That day of my life is past, and I am by remains what you might call an Asolando. I don't seem to impress you with that fact. I'm a human being, not to be played like a red apple, or trampled upon like grass, or listened to as though I were a foolish little brook. I'm actually given to the highway, and I prepare to stand on my own feet."

"Too, for the matter of that. I should have a motor, but lacking the coin I pedal a bicycle. My wheel has done more in the last hours. You see, Mr.
Chimney Man, I am a plain street person and have no intention of deceiving you. My name was Francesa for one day only. It may interest you to know that my real name is Hezekiah."

"Hezekiah! That you are Cecilia's sister and Miss Hollister's niece?"

"Folly!"

"And you live?"

"Over there somewhere beyond that ridge." And she waved her hand vaguely toward the village and laughed
again.

"Pray tell me what this particular joke is. It must be immensely funny." I inhaled, straining with these new facts.

"Oh, it's Aunt Octavia! She will be the death of me yet. You know the girl who waited on Aunt Octavia that afternoon took all the artistic possibilities as seriously as a funeral, and she told me after you left with the great evil horror, that Aunt Octavia had asked for a cocktail." "That lunch-table of Aunt Octavia's?"

"But you know," she resumed, "that Aunt Octavia never drank a cocktail in her life, and wouldn't." "She doesn't know a cocktail from a southerly strap. She goes for adventures. She is just like a boarding school girl who has read her first romance of the young American republic, the slooting the insurgents full of torillas and marrying the president's dark-eyed daughter. She reads pirate books and is crazy about buried chests and pieces of eight. And they say I'm just like her. She is the most perfect killing person in the world." Hezekiah laughed again.

CHAPTER VIII.

Nine Silk Hats Cross a Stile.

So this was the child whose devotion had rendered Wiggins so unstable and the sister of whom Cecilia Hollister had not must have spoken so strangely. I had not suspected it. She was as unlike Cecilia as possible, and the difference lay in her independent spirit and bulldoggish humor.

She jumped down from the wall, shook three apples from a tree and sustained them in the air with the deftness and certainty of practiced jugglery. Her absorption was complete, and when she weary of this sport she threw the apples away, one after the other, with a boy's free swing of the arm. Her rick would have delighted in her. Her sister would have spun her bright hair into a roudon, but only Alrich, with a twinkle in his eye, could have broug-her up to date in a dozen chiming comperts.

She had gone on up to the crest of the orchard and stood clearly lined against the sky, her hands thrust into the pockets of her sweater. She appeared to be brooding upon something that lay beyond and half turned her head and summoned me by whistling.
I liked this better than the question method of address. It was a clear signal pipe, that whistle, and she responded to it further by a peremptory wave of her arm. When I stood behind her I was surprised to find that she

Make Us Prove It

We dare not exaggerate to you. We are dependent upon your patronage. To get it we must have your trust and confidence. We make the following statements with a full understanding of what they mean to us. You are safe when you believe in these statements:

For the Bowels

If you only knew as much as we and those who have used them know about Rexall Orderlies, you would be as enthusiastic about recommending them as we are. They taste just like candy. They act so easily and so pleasantly that the taking of them is a pleasure.

Even children like Rexall Orderlies; and you know that if a medicine appeals to a child, it will appeal to grown-ups.

Rexall Orderlies

help chase gloom, dispel blues and make you feel happy by their splendid tone, clearing and strengthening effect upon the bowels. They act to free the system and keep it free from the distress and ill feeling that naturally results from irregular and inactive bowels.

Rexall Orderlies do this quietly, without griping or causing nausea, purging or excessive looseness. They act to overcome and remove the cause.

CAUTION: Please bear in mind that Rexall Orderlies are not sold by all druggists. You can buy Rexall Orderlies only at The Rexall Stores.

FASHION'S NEW-EST CREATIONS

Are on Display This Week to The Fair Sex of Charlevoix.

Never Before Have Our Milliners Shown Such Attractive Designs at Openings.

Although the Easter season came very early this year Charlevoix milliners are making a fine display to attract the fair sex and never before has there been such a display in our city.

Mrs. H. A. Carr, whose opening takes place today and tomorrow, has a beautiful showing of the latest in designs and hard to find indeed must be the lady who cannot find here exactly the hat she is looking for.

Miss A. Kenning at Emory's old stand, also has her opening today and tomorrow. Miss Kenning is no stranger to her patrons in this city and she is making a fine display of Easter hats as well as mid-summer hats and flowers. The showing of early hats are close fitting and trimmed very plainly.

Mrs. Ethel Cessna, at the Hat Shop, Mrs. Atchison's old stand, held her opening last week and frowning skies and impassible roads couldn't keep back the crowds who came to admire. Master Lawrence Parmelee, dressed in white, distributed carnations to the guests. Mrs. Cessna is showing all the latest models and colors. Special showings are made of French chips in Bulgarian colors and shades; small French hats in boat shape effects; aeroplane hats and bows in Milan and Tagli brands.

A magnificent showing is made of hats in the new shades of gray combined with raspberry, rose, nelly, brown, brown, and walnut shades.

Later on Mrs. Cessna will make a fine showing of Panamas in the latest shapes and designs.

LECTURE CAMPAIGN

Will be Conducted Throughout Neighboring States by Secretary John I. Gibson.

The executive committee of the Western Michigan Development bureau held a meeting Thursday afternoon at Traverse City and discussed matters of importance to the organization. The idea of conducting a lecture campaign throughout southern Michigan, northern Ohio and Indiana was taken up and adopted and secretary John I. Gibson left Monday for that territory to arrange dates for his appearance in the various towns that look like good territory in which to obtain settlers. Several invitations have been received by the bureau from towns in the southern part of the state asking that Mr. Gibson be sent there and it is believed that by extending the campaign satisfactory results will be obtained. The itinerary will be arranged so that the lectures will begin soon and continue until the first part of May.

The question of issuing a new booklet by the bureau was taken up and it was decided to postpone the publication until next fall.

The finances of the bureau are coming along in a very satisfactory manner, but a special effort will be made to induce the G. R. & I. railroad to get into line and come across with a contribution for the work. This is the only road that has not regularly contributed to the work of development, although it has shared the results of increased business from the advertising that has been done. The people of the western Michigan section feel aggrieved over this attitude and prepare will be brought to bear to bring the officials into the fold.

THROUGH ROUTE BOOSTED

At Big Good Roads Meeting Held at Traverse City Last Week.

A big crowd attended the good roads meeting held at Traverse City last week, and much enthusiasm was manifested over the through roads proposition from the Indiana state line to the straits.

A committee was appointed to prepare maps showing the roads that had been built and those that were in process of construction. Other maps will be made to show all data from counties along the shore line.

It was decided to make an inspection tour through the northwest and along the shore to the Indiana state line, starting from the south limit July 7. This will be made through the entire route, furthering a campaign for the good roads movement.

An executive committee was appointed to cooperate with the officers of the West Michigan Lake Shore Highway which was L. H. Trout, president, Muskegon; Dr. William DeKline, secretary, Grand Haven; R. M. Hoffman, treasurer, Nanticoke.

The executive committee consists of these officers and Frank Hampton, John I. Gibson, Traverse City; B. H. Day, Glen Haven; J. E. Merritt, Muskegon.

No attempt should be made to feed Dairy Cows any large amount of the necessary protein through Cotton Seed Meal, too much is not only constipating but irritating to the digestive tract and causes much disorder and trouble. Two pounds per day should be the limit.

No grain-food is more easily digested and more cooling to the digestive tract and system than good Wheat Bran and it should form a large portion of every dairy ration.

H. F. PROBERT

Mr. Probert very clearly brings out the fact that while Cotton Seed Meal, for example, contains a large amount of protein, a cow or other animal can only be fed a very small amount of it and hence the amount of protein given to an animal in this way per day is very slight.

Of BRAN it is possible to feed a very much larger amount, and while the per cent of protein is much smaller, the animal can actually be fed a much larger amount of protein through this feed. Please note Mr. Probert's closing sentence.

"GOOD WHEAT BRAN should form a large portion of every dairy ration."

Argo Milling Co.

WILL DISCUSS SOCIAL EVIL

Next Meeting of Men's Class Will Take up This Important Subject.

Hour of Meeting Changed. Ex-Mayor Hampton Will Address the Class March 30.

For one month, commencing next Sunday, March 24, the Men's Bible class will meet at the Carnegie library building at 5:30 o'clock p. m. instead of 12:00 o'clock noon as heretofore.

The topic next Sunday is a general discussion on the "Social Evil." The following Sunday, March 30, Ex-Mayor Hampton will talk to us on city matters, particularly with reference to the form of government which the city should adopt. Last Sunday, A. B. Clark of Barnard talked to the class on "The Religion of Jesus Christ," giving a very stirring and clear cut address on the vital importance of the right apprehension, as well as the right practice of the religion which Jesus came to establish. It was a message which will be remembered by those who were present and Mr. Clark received many expressions of gratitude for his most excellent address. It is evident that as "Tony" has tramped over the hills of Barnard, his thoughts have been running in the same channels as those of the "Man of Nazareth" as he tramped the hills of Galilee, and that he has imbibed the spirit as well as the thought of the Master.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY PARTY

Pleasantly Observed by Number of Ladies at the Home of Mrs. John C. Miller.

Monday afternoon, St. Patrick's Day, a large number of ladies quietly stole into the home of Mrs. John C. Miller, where they had been invited by Bridget O'Donley in honor of Mrs. Miller and Mrs. C. S. Dodge.

The dining room and tables were beautifully decorated in green and white. Dainty refreshments were served and old friendships renewed.

All returned to their homes at a late hour still chatting to the old saying: "There is Nothing Too Good for the Irish."

Equal Suffrage Notes.

The Michigan Christian Advocate says: "There can be no question that sentiment favoring equal suffrage is rapidly growing. One by one the states are wheeling into line for it. Michigan ought to make her place in the column, if she is ever to do so. Her women citizens are intelligent, self-controlled, progressive and worthy. None better can be found. They will vote intelligently, conscientiously and bravely if permitted to vote at all. Shall they be permitted?"

"The opponents of equal suffrage, when run down and cornered, prove to be brawlers and whisky rings, hoodlums, oil trusts, and all kinds of special interests. Women will vote for humanity rather than for property." Atlantic City N. J. Press.

Some good men are doubtful about the results of the ballot in the hands of women. They are not sure women would vote for good men and good measures and against bad men and bad measures. But the brewers and distillers and gamblers and vicious interests generally in the state are not in the least doubtful. They know women would vote for the right and against the wrong and so every man of them is opposed to equal suffrage. A good man should not be long in doubt when he finds what company he is to be in for "anti."

The Washington (D. C.) Times says: "The earnest, intelligent women of America have won their battle for equal rights. All that remains is the recording of the victory. The legislatures of the states will be called on to serve the purpose of registers to ring up the Nation's decision."

Now comes this cheering word from Spokane, Washington, regarding the actual results of woman suffrage. Says the Spokane Chronicle: "If the people of this state didn't know anything about equal suffrage, they might have an idea that the woman who votes must be six feet tall, a hand like a blacksmith and a disposition like a mule. But they've tried it and they propose to keep on trying. They've seen the ballots of these feminine citizens help to smash rings, break party lines to fragments, and clear the way for reform. They have found that these new voters have no use for the race in office, for the hypocrite, for the grafter, and they know that from Amundsen's coldest cache in Peary's farthest igloo, the world holds no fairer, no brighter, no gentler, no truer, no better, no dearer wives or mothers or sisters or daughters or sweethearts than the voting women of Washington."

Congressman Stevens from New Hampshire says: "Any man who believes in real democracy must be a believer in and vote for equal suffrage."

A Cold, La Grippe, Then Pneumonia

It's too often the fatal sequence. La Grippe coughs hang on, weaken the system, and lower the vital resistance. R. G. Collins, postmaster, Barnegat, N. J., says: "I was troubled with a severe La Grippe cough which completely exhausted me. Foley's Honey and Tar Compound soon stopped the coughing spell entirely. It can't be beat." Branding Criminals.

Until the end of the nineteenth century the prisoners' dock in most important English law courts was furnished with an iron upright and collar fixed in front of the person who was being tried. If a conviction followed and the judge elected to include a degree of branding in the sentence that portion of it was carried out upon the spot. The criminal's hand was put through the collar, which was effectually screwed around the wrist and the necessary branding iron having been previously heated in the courthouse fire, was forthwith marked upon the thumb with the letters which the judge directed to be burned upon it.

Was Cries.

In the very early days the French and their "vel de guerre" the Scotch their "sogin" and the English their war cries, but so many cries were launched by the different great British lords that in 1195 parliament passed a law forbidding these cries on the ground that they produced disorder, allowing but one battle cry, "St. George and the King."

MICHIGAN CROP REPORT

For February Shows That Wheat Has Suffered Injury in The State at Large.

WHEAT.

In answer to the question, "Has wheat during February suffered injury from any cause?" 328 correspondents in the state answer "yes" and 208 "no"; in the southern counties 210 answer "yes" and 91 "no"; in the central counties 57 answer "yes" and 46 "no"; in the northern counties 30 answer "yes" and 82 "no" and in the Upper Peninsula 1 answers "yes" and 19 "no."

Snow protected wheat in the state and central counties 13 days; in the southern counties 3; in the northern counties 24; and in the Upper Peninsula 24 days.

The average depth of snow on February 15th in the state was 2.53 inches; in the southern counties 0.48 of an inch; in the central counties 1.25; in the northern counties 6.85 and in the Upper Peninsula 12.81 inches. On the 28th the average depth of snow in the state was 5.88 inches; in the southern counties 4.13; in the central counties 3.66; in the northern counties 10.30 and in the Upper Peninsula 18.46 inches.

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in February at 55 flouring mills is 99,364 and at 50 elevators and to grain dealers 49,564, or a total of 148,928. Of this amount 77,921 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 28,165 in the central counties and 12,834 in the northern counties and Upper Peninsula.

The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the seven months August-February is 3,500,000. One hundred and twenty-three mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat purchased in February.

The average condition of live stock in the state is reported as follows, comparison being made with stock in good, healthy and thrifty condition: Horses, sheep and swine 10, cattle 95.

CONTESTS ARE ENDED

Huslers Win in Knights of Pythias—Reds in the Odd Fellows.

The contests which were being waged in our local lodges ended last week.

In the Knights-of-Pythias the "Huslers" which were captained by Richard Lewis put it all over the "Tigers," led by E. J. Miller. During the progress of the contest the "Tigers" have always been in the lead but as usual when anybody goes up against Dick Lewis they are bucking a stiff proposition and it proved true in this case. Dick turning in enough points the last night to win the fight so far ahead that his opponents never knew they were in a contest.

In the Oddfellow contest the "Reds" led by William Hignman were victors by the narrow margin of six and one-half points, which proves that the "Blues" put up a game fight, handicapped as they were by the absence of their captain, E. F. Vought.

The next thing is the supper which the losers must furnish the victors in which everybody will probably shine.

LOYAL ORDER MOOSE

Elect Officers For Ensuing Year at Meeting Held Last Night.

At the meeting of the Moose lodge last night the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Dictator—O. D. Hammond. Vice-Dictator—Barner Harrington.

Prelate—J. E. Redmond. Secretary—Richard Lewis. Treasurer—Walter Fairchild. Sergeant-at-Arms—William A. Smith, Jr.

Inner Guard—Z. A. Young. Outer Guard—George Stafford. Trustee, 3 years—Romero A. Emrey. Delegate to Supreme Lodge—Art Alcock.

After election the lodge enjoyed a supper.

O. W. Smith Home Again.

O. W. Smith returned home Saturday from Petoskey, where he has been for the past three months in the hospital, where he was operated upon, his leg being amputated below the knee. Although Mr. Smith is 78 years of age, he stood the operation in good shape and informs us he is feeling better than he has in years, which is good news to his friends.

Low In Poor Condition.
When a cow shows signs of being out of condition following calving she should have a physic, says the Farm Journal. Dissolve one pound of epsom salts and a quarter of a cupful of salt in three pints of warm water and add one cupful of blackstrap molasses and a tablespoonful of ground ginger root. Give this slowly and carefully from a long-necked bottle as one dose. Blanket the cow about the chest and body while the physic is acting and allow warm drinks of gruel or flaxseed tea. When the physic has operated give her twice daily in a pint of flaxseed tea half a dram of fluid extract of nut-vanilla, two drams of fluid extract of gentian root and one ounce of pure alcohol. Allow some exercise when the weather is fine and she is doing better.

Pumpkins as a Sheep Feed.

Pumpkins are an efficient and cheap fall feed for sheep. The seeds possess great medicinal value as a vermifuge while the pumpkins have considerable nutritive value. The pumpkins should be scattered by hand about the sheep pasture. The sheep will gnaw their way into the pumpkins and will eat them up clean with little danger of choking. The sheep like pumpkins and do well on them where this feed is used as described.

Treatment For Sweeney.

Driving with breast collar will be likely to help in cases of sweeney, but for a month prior to such exercise hand-massage several times a day the wasted parts and at the same time try to work the skin loose from joint and flesh. Each night rub the wasted parts thoroughly with a mixture of one part each of turpentine and aqua ammonia and six parts of raw linseed oil well shaken together.—Farm Journal.

Text of Judge Mayne's Decision Refusing to Grant New Trial.

End of Hardest Legal Battle in Michigan's Criminal History—Swift Still Protests His Innocence But Will Make Best of It.

Judge Mayne has given his decision in the matter of Herman L. Swift's motion for a new trial in the criminal case in which he was convicted, some months ago. Inasmuch as many copies of a periodical filled with matter intended to make Swift out a martyr to vicious boys and cruel laws, have been circulated in this vicinity, we believe the people at large will be interested in Judge Mayne's decision, the body of which follows:

"Respondent Herman L. Swift, having been convicted in this court, appealed to the Supreme Court, where his conviction was confirmed. He now presents a motion for a new trial. On the hearing of this motion the legality of his conviction is not in question. Respondent claims that he is innocent and he has been permitted, without objection, to present any matter that might justify the court in granting him innocent of the offense charged.

The inquiry took a wide range, covering the matters urged by the respondent, as follows:

1. The Leoni and the Chicago indictments and the Chicago church trouble.

2. The postal card claimed to exonerate respondent.

3. The statements of the jurors.

4. The alleged frame-up or combination of business interests, including county officers and leading business men in this county to ruin Mr. Swift.

5. That the liquor interests of the county had conspired to injure him.

6. That all the boys who had accused Mr. Swift of the crime had retracted.

7. That a fair trial in Charlevoix county could not be had by reason of local prejudice.

In considering these reasons urged for a new trial, we will follow the order named.

1. On the trial, respondent was not a witness in his own behalf, consequently the Leoni and Chicago indictments, and the expulsion of respondent from his church in Chicago for like offenses, were not considered by the jury, and strictly speaking, have no place in this proceeding. The testimony submitted consists of sworn and unsworn statements, newspaper clippings, etc., and relates chiefly to the Leoni matter, although some oral testimony was permitted relating to the church trouble. This testimony has a direct bearing upon respondent's general reputation, and while the witnesses testify of his good reputation, yet no adequate reason why his co-workers in the church and mission should conspire toasten upon him the crime charged.

2. The postal card presents the most important question. Its authorship is denied by the boy, who, it is claimed, wrote it, and is affirmed by another boy who says that he saw it written and that it was delivered to him to be forwarded to respondent. Were its authorship admitted by the claimed writer, then the circumstances under which it was written would have to be taken into consideration; but being denied, only the evidence for and against its authenticity may be considered.

To my mind the evidence against far outweighs that in favor of its alleged authorship. Much weight is attached to the unreliability and want of veracity of the alleged writer. This should have serious consideration. Q. Similar claim is made against the boy who says he participated in the procuring of the postal card. In addition it is shown that he was one of the first to accuse respondent of a similar practice with himself. While the reputation of both of these boys for truth is now assailed, Mr. Swift in times past, has borne witness as to their truthfulness and reliability. I have personally examined both boys in relation to this postal card, and I consider that its authorship has not been proven to any degree of certainty.

3. On the face of the record the so-called statements of the jurors present an unusual situation. The testimony of the jurors themselves, however, in open court at the hearing somewhat clears the situation. The juror, the last to agree to a verdict of guilty, now believes respondent innocent. Juror William Johnson denies the statements of Dr. L. R. Harlett, that he had an opinion and a prejudice against respondent prior to the trial. His denial is clear and emphatic. Knowing Mr. Johnson intimately, it is impossible to believe that he deliberately committed the crime of perjury in answering the questions asked him on his voir dire examination, or that he would do this great injustice to respondent. It is much more reasonable to believe that the witness, at this late date, is mistaken than to believe that the juror made the statement alleged. Four jurors are represented as making affidavits. One particular feature in relation to these affidavits presented itself. Each juror, except one, on the witness stand denied making any sworn statements. With one exception, the statements of all the jurors were based upon the representation of counsel or other friends of respondent that the postal card in question was authentic. Believing this, if the postal card had been in evidence, they said their verdict might have been different. These statements were made by the jurors after repeated visits to each of them. SENATOR SCOTT REAL LEADER

Legislative Ability and Power of Voice go Hand in Hand.

Detroit Times Says he is Most Popular Bachelor in Legislature.

"Your honor, err, I mean, Mr. President?" The speaker is the tall, innocent senator from the twenty-ninth, Frank D. Scott, president pro tem, and floor leader of the Republican majority in the senate. You see, he is so much at home on the floor of that dignified body, he sometimes forgets he isn't practicing in an ordinary court.

Being the man depended upon to blaze the trail for his party, he gets as many chances to have his say as the next one and his opinions are expressed vividly in a wealth of Ciceroian words and phrases with picturesque additions of more modern invention. The fact is, he is temperamentally inclined to be a little picturesque and since that style shows up his good qualities well, it would be folly to curb the bent.

Recently, after one of his speeches which was even more forcible than usual, an opposing senator said he resembled a storm on Thunder bay. Of course this unkind thrust was made in the heat of debate, but whatever the animus which prompted it, there can be no denial that when the senator from Alpena waves eloquent his enunciation might well be calculated to make the "Tiber tremble underneath her banks." His voice was loud upon a scale too large for a state senate chamber, and it is no secret that the senator hopes sometimes to give it the proper setting.

Frank Douglas Scott was born of Scotch parentage in the City of Alpena, August 25, 1878. He was graduated from the law department of the University of Michigan in 1901, and since then has practiced law and served as circuit court commissioner, prosecuting attorney, city attorney and United States commissioner for the eastern district of Michigan which position he still holds. He is one of the popular bachelor members of the legislature.

WILL HOLD A FULL HAND

Voters Will Be Given Handful of Ballots at the April Election.

Attorney General Rules That Each Amendment
Must Have Separate Ballot.

When the voter goes to the polls April 7 he will be handed a full hand of ballots, the attorney general having decided that a separate ballot must be prepared for each constitutional amendment submitted, which means that in this city it will require seven ballots.

First will be the regular state and county ballot, on which all political parties will be represented by candidates for the various offices elected at the spring election. On the same ballot will appear the names of the candidates for county road commissioners, only the Republican party having candidates.

The next on the list will be the city ballot, the Republican and Democratic parties each presenting a ticket for the favor of the electors. In the order in which the constitutional amendments were submitted, the amendment granting the right of suffrage to women will come first. During the campaign last fall this question was fully discussed and this spring the Courier has given the advocates of the measure a half column in which to set forth their claims—a privilege which would have been accorded the other side, if asked for by a local organization. This is one of the most important questions ever submitted to the electors of this state and every voter should carefully study both sides of the question. If it prevails it becomes a part of our organic laws for all time. On the other hand if it fails it probably will not be again submitted for a long period of years.

The next amendment is one relative to amending the constitution so that the legislature may pass an act pensioning firemen. Amendments will also be submitted to amend the constitution by providing for the initiative, both on laws and on constitutional amendments; for the referendum and the recall. While these are familiar terms to most of the people, having been discussed quite freely for the past few years, to the end that the electors may cast an intelligent vote we will, before election, give a full explanation of the proposed amendments.

MAKE FISHING LAWS UNIFORM

Committees of Michigan and Wisconsin Legislatures Hold Conference.

Prospects Are Bright for Joint Agreement According to Senator Walter.

Prospects are bright for the agreement upon uniform fish legislation by the states of Michigan and Wisconsin, according to Senator Robert E. Walter of Traverse City, who is chairman of a joint committee which went to Madison, Wisconsin last week to hold a conference with a similar body from the Wisconsin legislature.

Fish and Game Warden W. R. Bates, who accompanied the committee, has had some correspondence with the Wisconsin warden and reports the outlook as favorable.

One of the points on which agreement is especially hoped for is the fixing of identical closed seasons for the different protected fish so that the poaching of fishermen from one state in the waters of the other may be prevented. Another is to determine upon the boundaries of these waters to be observed.

As a basis for the discussion of specific provisions, the Michigan committee will use the Clark bill to regulate commercial fishing in the great lakes which was passed by the house and held back by the senate committee in anticipation of this conference.

This bill was the outcome of a meeting held in Lansing in February which was attended by more than 60 practical fishermen. It is recognized as the nearest to a generally satisfactory proposal yet offered. Among other things, it provides for artificial propagation the desirability of which the fishermen have come to recognize.

Bays and harbors are included under the provisions of the law by it, and the use of nets in any part of Detroit river or any of the other connecting waters is forbidden.

It clears up the herring fishing situation of Lake Superior, where the law has been disregarded, by making legal the use of two and a half inch mesh nets in catching blue back herring during the open season for them. Some additional changes in favor of the fishermen are to raise the percentage of immature fish which may be taken from 10 to 15 and to put the close seasons for trout and whitefish one after the other instead of at the same time.

The waters included in this regulation extend some 300 miles from north to south making a zone system to correspond with the advancing season very desirable, said Senator Walter.

"If we could include that feature, the bill would be much better but the attorney general is of the opinion it would be unconstitutional, a local act where a general is applicable. The question is, can a general act be made to apply? Is the fact that a particular kind of fish is found at both ends of Lake Michigan a more essential part of the situation than that the season opens at different time in the two places?"

The other members of the committee who went to Madison are Senator Woodworth of Port Huron and Representatives Jensen of Delta, Morford of Presque Isle and Clark of Ottawa.

BOYS FREEZE TO DEATH

While on Skating Expedition on the Straits of Mackinaw.

Bodies Were in St. Ignace—Bodies Recovered by The Car Ferry Sunday.

Last week's severe storm resulted in the death of two boys on the Straits of Mackinaw. They were Iver Johnson, fourteen years old, and Alton Westberg, twelve, both of St. Ignace.

The boys started out from their home Friday morning on a skating expedition on the straits. While they were gone, the storm came up and the boys failed to appear. Saturday morning witnessed the formation of sealing parties, and thirty-five men were busy all day on the ice. However, the bodies could not be found so it was believed the boys had fallen into the channel.

While crossing the straits Sunday morning, people on the car ferry saw the two bodies lying on the ice, and they were taken aboard. The boys had been frozen to death.

TERRIBLE STORMS

Cause Heavy Property Loss in All Sections of the Country.

The terrible storms of the past few days played havoc with the mails of this city, all railroads being tied up with washouts.

The first of the week the Pere Marquette was tied up by a washout two miles south of Petoskey, in the big cut.

Charles Easton and another youth driving home from this city, barely escaped going into the big ditch, which would have meant the loss of their lives.

A cut fifty feet deep, was washed in an embankment, tearing out the state road and carrying fifty feet of track into Lake Traverse Bay.

A portion of the county road was washed away causing a loss of $1000.

In the nation at large the loss will be the heaviest ever recorded in the history of the nation, being spread all over the country.

COLLECT ON DELIVERY

Regulations for Extension of the Parcel Post System.

WHICH TAKES EFFECT JULY 1

Ten Cents in Parcel Post Stamps Additional Only Cost of Service.

Which Also Insures Parcel Against Loss—Further Information Relative to the Working Out of the New Plan.

Patrons of the parcel post system will be much interested in the new order relative to sending packages C. O. D. which will go into effect July 1.

To further the workings of the C. O. D. system, the Postmaster General has caused a set of regulations relative thereto to be sent to each of the postmasters in the United States, which clearly outlines the rules to be followed in handling such packages, as follows:

Sec. 16.—The sender of a mailable parcel on which the postage is fully prepaid may have the price of the article and the charges thereon collected from the addressee on payment of a fee of ten cents in parcel post stamps affixed, provided the amount to be collected does not exceed $100. Such a parcel will be insured against loss, without additional charge, in an amount equivalent to its actual value, but not to exceed $50.

The sender of a collect on delivery C. O. D. parcel will be given a receipt showing the office and date of mailing, the number of the parcel, and the amount due him.

A C. O. D. parcel will be accepted for mailing only at a money order office and when addressed to a money order office. Money order offices are designated in the parcel post guide by an asterisk or a dagger. The postmaster at the mailing office will be held responsible for the postage required for the return of a parcel addressed to a non-money order office.

If a C. O. D. parcel is received at a non-money order office, the postmaster will notify the office of mailing of the amount of postage required for its return. The postmaster at the office of mailing will ascertain from the sender whether he desires the parcel returned or delivered without collection of the charges. If the sender notifies him in writing that the parcel may be delivered without collecting the charges, he will attach the order to the office coupon and notify the postmaster at the office of address to that effect. If no reply is received from the mailing office, the parcel will be treated as provided in Section 49, 50 and 52.

The C. O. D. tag must show the amount due the sender, the money order fee necessary to make the remittance, and the total amount to be collected. It should be securely attached to the parcel, which should be numbered to correspond with the tag, stamped C. O. D., and the charges to be collected, plainly written thereon. The parcel will be treated as ordinary mail until it reaches the office of address, where on payment of all charges, it will be delivered to the addressee, or, unless otherwise directed by the addressee, to the person, firm or corporation in whose care it is addressed, or to any responsible person to whom the addressee's ordinary mails customarily delivered. A receipt for the parcel must be obtained on the tag attached thereto.

A receipt signed by a person other than the addressee must show the name of the addressee as well as that of the person signing it. A signature made by mark X must be attested by a reputable witness. When a C. O. D. parcel is received without the tag attached the charges shown on the parcel must be collected and the prescribed receipt obtained from the addressee.

An employee must receive for the total number of parcels given him for delivery. This receipt will be surrendered to him either on the return of the parcels or the receipt. (Continued on page 7.)

Keeps Your Stove "Always Ready for Company"

A bright, clean, glossy stove is the joy and pride of every housekeeper. But it is hard to keep a stove nice and shiny—unless Black Silk Stove Polish is used. Here is the reason: Black Silk Stove Polish sticks right to the iron. It doesn't rub off or dust off. Its shine lasts four times longer than the shine of any other polish. You only need to polish one-fourth as often, yet your stove will be cleaner, brighter and better looking than it has been since you first bought it. Use.

BLACK SILK STOVE POLISH

On your parlor stove, kitchen stove or gas stove, get as clean from your hardware or stove dealer. If you do not mind it better than any other stove polish you have, or used before, your dealer is authorized to refund your money. But we feel sure you will agree with the thousands of other people who are now using Black Silk Stove Polish and who say it is the "Best Stove Polish" ever made.

LIQUID OR PASTE ONE QUALITY

Be sure to get the genuine. Black Silk Stove Polish costs you no more than the ordinary kind. Keep your grates, registers, fenders and stove pipes bright and free from rusting by using BLACK SILK AIR-DRYING ENAMEL. Brush with each can of enamel.

Use BLACK SILK METAL POLISH for silver, ware, nickel, tinware or brass. It works quickly, easily and leaves a brilliant surface. It has no equal for use on automobiles.

Miss Blanche Rogers spent Sunday at her home at Cross Village.

Miss Dessie Groenink substituted in Miss Jarvis' room the last hour Friday afternoon.

D. C. Nettleton visited the normal class and gave a very interesting account of his experiences in Mexico.

The Misses Sophia Berg, Merle Brecheisen, Hazel Gilmartin and Agnes Worth spent Sunday at their respective homes.

Miss Hazel Mills entertained the normal class at the home of Mrs. Will Marshall. Several interesting games were played, after which a delicious lunch was served. The table was very prettily decorated in the class colors and the class flower. All the members of the class were present and thoroughly enjoyed the evening.

Women Suffrage Items.

The working conditions of 8,000,000 women, 2,000,000 children at work in sweat shops, adulterated and impure food, unsanitary tenements, demoralizing living conditions, the white slave traffic, these are the things that demand the ballot for women.

Have you ever thought why your mother, wife, sister, and daughter are not allowed to vote? The only reason for not enfranchising any class of people in a democracy is because they are mentally or morally incompetent to vote. 125 years ago girls were not admitted to the public grammar schools; married women were not admitted to colleges; married women could not own property and married women did not own their children. All of these conditions are now changed or are rapidly changing. The mental competence of women is now recognized in all phases of social responsibility—except that of the franchise.

Who can't vote in Michigan? Insane, idiots, aliens, criminals, children and women. Is it a square deal for women?

Judge Landis says: "Some claim that women's place is in the home. So it is but it should not be her prison. If the women remained at home there would be no churches, no libraries, no hospitals, no homes for the needy."

The latest strange Bulletin calls on all grangers to rally their forces in support of the suffrage amendment. It states that a canvass of Ingham county gave 81 per cent of the women in favor of suffrage.

The Cry Of The Women.

We have borne our sons and daughters.

And suffered in joy our pain;

In war with its myriad slughters

We have cared for wounded and slain;

We have shared your dream of tomorrow.

We have shared your work of today.

We have comforted you in sorrow.

We have smiled when the sky was gray.

We are fit for wives and mothers, in palace or in cot;

We are fit for the fret and trouble, but we are not fit to vote.

CHAPTER IX.

Cecilia's Silver Notebook.

MISS HOLLISTER disappeared in the hall without excuse, and I entered the library to find Cecilia sitting alone by the fire. She put aside a book she had been reading and, seeing that her aunt had not followed me, asked at once as to my visit to the hall.

"I conveyed your message," I answered, "but you have seen Mr. Wiggins since, unless I am greatly mistaken."

"Yes, he called this afternoon. We had several callers at the tea hour. I had rather expected you back."

"The fact is," I replied, "that after I had taken luncheon at the Prescott Arms I got lost among the hills, and while in the act of robbing an apple orchard I came most unexpectedly upon your sister."

"Hezekiah!"

"The same. And, oddly enough, I had met her before, though I didn't realize it was she until the meeting in the orchard. It was in the Asolando that I saw her; she was in the cashier's ticket the afternoon I met your aunt there."

"You have given me information, Mr. Ames, I did not know that Hezekiah had ever been connected with the Asolando."

"Oh, it was only that one historic day. She says the place was unbearable. She jarred the holdest chords of the divine lyre by first comments on the pre-lapsarian profile. One of the devotees was so shocked that she dropped a plate or something and, to put it coarsely, Hezekiah got the bounce."

My description of Hezekiah's brief tenure of office at the Asolando seemed to amuse Cecilia greatly.

"There is no one like my sister," she said. "There never was and there never will be any one half so charming. Hezekiah is an original, who breaks all the rules and yet always sends the bad over the net. And it is because she is so inexpressibly dear and precious that I am anxious, that nothing shall ever hurt her—nothing mar the sweet, beautiful child spirit in her."

It was my turn to laugh now. Cecilia's manifestation of maternal solicitude for Hezekiah seemed absurd, for Hezekiah in her way was older. Hezekiah had raced with Diana and plucked arrows from her grille—she had heard Homer at the roadside singing of Achilles' shield.

"Hezekiah is reasonably safe, I should say, because she is so amazingly swift of foot and eye and so nimble of speech. She is not to be caught in a net or tripped with a word."

"I suppose that is so," remarked Cecilia soberly. "You thought her happy when you met her today? She did not strike you as being a girl with a wound in her heart? She wasn't particularly sad?"

"Not more so than sunlight on rippled water or the song of the lark as ceasing."

"Of course you made no reference to Mr. Wiggins? If I had imagined you would meet her I should have."

"She ended with an embarrassment that I now understood, and I broke in cheerfully."

"We did mention him. She asked me if I had seen him, and it was the thought of him that evoked her merriest laughter."

"She shook her head and sighed, then her manner changed abruptly. You delivered my message to Mr. Wiggins?"

"I did. He is badly out of sorts and sees nothing clearly. He is very bitter toward your aunt. He thinks she has treated him outrageously."

"Aunt Octavia has done nothing of the kind," she replied with spirit. "Mr. Wiggins has no right to speak of Aunt Octavia save in terms of kindness. If her wits are sharper than his, it is not her fault, that I can see. But there are matters here that I do not understand. Mr. Ames, I trust you, as my aunt evidently does, or I should not be talking to you as I am, and I am moved to ask a favor of you, in favor of considerable weight. In view of the fact that you are a professional man, with doubtless, many pressing calls upon your time."
